Whereas since restrictions are placed upon privately owned lending institutions prohibiting them from making loans to settlers on Bureau of Reclamation projects during the period of construction; and

Whereas it is the principle of Federal Reclamation that lands be made available to reliable people who have not otherwise been able to become landowners and it is generally true that these settlers have not the means to equip a farm at present prices and are urgently in need of credit for the first few years; and

Whereas the Farmers Home Administration has the authority to make loans to settlers on reclamation projects who cannot obtain such credit from other sources; and

Whereas funds available for distribution by the Farmers Home Administration are inadequate for the needs of settlers on these projects, many of whom are veterans; and

Whereas irrigation project settlers have built an enviable reputation for repayment of credit advanced and in no sense are asking for charity: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Oregon Reclamation Congress, That the Congress of the United States be urged to appropriate sufficient funds and these be specifically allotted to provide loan funds for this purpose; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent the Members of the Oregon congressional delegation.

Resolution 10

INSTRUCTIONS TO OFFICERS

Resolved, That the officers of the Oregon Reclamation Congress are directed to call the resolutions adopted this thirty-eighth annual meeting to the attention of the appropriate Federal agencies, to the Members of the Congress, the Governor of Oregon, and to all others concerned therewith and that the officers and directors of the Oregon Reclamation Congress shall carry out the policies declared in said resolutions.

Resolution 11

INSTRUCTIONS TO LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Be it resolved, That the Oregon Reclamation Congress hereby delegates to its legislative committee and its executive officers the authority to approve and disapprove for and on behalf of the congress such bills as may be presented to the 1951 session of the Oregon Legislature as may affect the members of the congress.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. IVES:

S. 543. A bill for the relief of Elizabeth Jean Clarke;

S. 544. A bill for the relief of Joseph Rossabi, Corrine Rossabi, Mayer Rossabi, and Morris Rossabi;

S. 545. A bill for the relief of Ibrahim Moise Chammah;

S. 546. A bill for the relief of Khodarahm Sourshian;

S. 547. A bill to extend the time within which proceedings may be commenced, or appeal may be taken, to determine the claims of Louis W. Schaaff for a patent;

S. 548. A bill for the relief of Freidoun Jalayer;

S. 549. A bill for the relief of Szewel and Dwojra Tukaczynski; and

S. 550. A bill for the relief of Sadako Kawamura Lawton; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(Mr. IVES (for himself, Mr. MORSE, Mr. SALTONSTALL, Mr. LODGE, Mr. HENDRICKSON, Mr. LANGER, Mr. CAPEHART, Mr. JENNER, Mr. MARTIN, Mr. DUFF, Mrs. SMITH of Maine, and Mr. TOBEY) introduced Senate bill 551, to prohibit discrimination in employment because of race, religion, color, national origin, or ancestry, which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and appears under a separate heading.)

(Mr. McCARRAN introduced Senate bill 552, to amend Public Law 717 of the Eighty-first Congress to permit the admission of alien spouses and minor children of citizen members of the United States Armed Forces, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. MARTIN:

S. 553. A bill for the relief of Dr. Szu'tai Tsou;

S. 554. A bill for the relief of Boutros Mouallem; and

S. 555. A bill to make it an offense against the United States to use the flag of the United States for advertising purposes, or to mutilate, defile, or cast contempt upon the flag of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HOLLAND (for himself and Mr. SMATHERS):

S. 556. A bill authorizing the transfer of certain lands in Putnam County, Fla., to the State Board of Education of Florida for the use of the University of Florida for educational purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 557. A bill for the relief of certain claimants who suffered losses and sustained damages as the result of the campaign carried out by the Federal Government for the eradication of the Mediterranean fruitfly in the State of Florida; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska:

S. 558. A bill to amend section 284 of the United States Code relating to disqualifications of former officers and employees in matters connected with their former duties; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McCARRAN:

S. 559. A bill for the relief of Mrs. Frank Edward Aibisu; and

S. 560. A bill for the relief of Dr. Louis S. K. Yuan; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(Mr. MORSE introduced Senate bill 561, to require certain members of the legislative, judicial, and executive branches of the Government to file statements relating to amount and sources of income, and dealings in securities and commodities, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. LANGER:

S. 562. A bill to provide that pensions shall be extended to the widows and children of deceased World War II veterans on the same conditions as they are now extended to the widows and children of deceased World War I veterans; to the Committee on Finance.

S. 563. A bill to amend section 6 of the act of August 24, 1912, as amended, with respect to the recognition of organizations of postal and Federal employees; and

S. 564. A bill to adjust the rates of annuities for certain employees retired under the Civil Service Retirement Act of May 29, 1930, as amended, prior to April 1, 1948; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

(Mr. LANGER also introduced Senate bill 565, to increase by $50 per month the allowances provided for dependents of enlisted personnel in active service in the Armed Forces, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. MORSE:

S. 566. A bill for the relief of Helena Jange Chinn; and

S. 567. A bill for the relief of Habibollah Farahnik and Nona Yaaghoub Zadeh Vijeh Farahnik; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SALTONSTALL:

S. 568. A bill for the relief of George W. Purdy;

S. 569. A bill for the relief of May Hosken; and

S. 570. A bill for the relief of George Kedzieraki; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(Mr. O'MAHONEY (for himself and Mr. ANDERSON) introduced Senate Joint Resolution 20, to provide for the continuation of operations under certain mineral leases issued by the respective States covering submerged lands of the Continental Shelf, to encourage the continued development of such leases, to provide for the protection of the interests of the United States in the oil and gas deposits of said lands, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and appears under a separate heading.)

(Mr. MORSE introduced Senate Joint Resolution 21, to provide for placing a suitable plaque on the base of the statue of Edward Dickinson Baker in the rotunda of the Capitol, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, and appears under a separate heading.)

PROHIBITION OF DISCRIMINATION IN EMPLOYMENT BECAUSE OF RACE, RELIGION, COLOR, ETC.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER], the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MARTIN], the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUFF], the Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH], and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], I introduce for appropriate reference a bill which would prohibit discrimination in employment because of race, religion, color, national origin, or ancestry, and I ask unanimous consent that I may make a statement in connection with the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the Senator from New York may proceed.

The bill (S. 551) to prohibit discrimination in employment because of race, religion, color, national origin, or ancestry, introduced by Mr. IVES (for himself and other Senators), was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, this bill is identical with S. 984 in the Eightieth Congress and S. 174 in the Eighty-first Congress. Both of those bills had bipartisan sponsorship, consisting of four Republicans and four Democrats. I firmly believe that the question of civil rights, and especially discrimination in employment, should never be allowed to become a partisan issue. Even though all of the sponsors of the bill I am now introducing are Republicans, I am sure that I speak for every one of them when I state that they feel as I do about this matter.

However, it will be recalled by those who were Members of the Eighty-first Congress that S. 174, even though with bipartisan sponsorship, was not the bill which was reported from the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare and which subsequently was the issue in two cloture votes in efforts to have it taken up for consideration by the Senate. The bill in question, S. 1728, in the Eighty-first Congress, was introduced and sponsored by a member of the Democratic Party and differed to some extent from S. 174. Insofar as I am aware, in the formulation and drafting of S. 1728, Republicans were not consulted. Moreover, it would appear that this bill was not offered in the name of bipartisanship, but rather as an administration measure calculated to carry out administration policy and a pledge in the Democratic platform of 1948.

Be all this as it may, I was very glad to support S. 1728. Although I was not in full agreement on all of its provisions, it nevertheless was based on the fundamental principles inherent in S. 174. These are the principles that (1) discrimination in employment because of race, religion, color, national origin, or ancestry is in violation of our American creed, and (2) that no statute to combat this type of discrimination can be effective unless it contains at least a minimum of enforcement provisions.

The bill I am now offering for introduction meets the requirements of these two basic principles. It is based wholly on the New York law against discrimination which has worked so successfully in New York State; in fact, it constitutes the translation of this New York law and similar State laws into the Federal pattern.

We who are sponsoring it do not do so in any spirit of partisanship. We cannot regard it as the Republican bill. We do consider it an answer by some Republicans to one of America's most serious domestic problems. We offer it in the desire that it will be considered by the committee to whom it is referred equally with other proposals of this nature which may be submitted.

Also, I would point out that this bill should not be regarded in any sense as a substitute or alternative for any Executive directive or order dealing with this matter, which may be issued by the President. Personally, I strongly favor the issuance of such an order, and I feel that this action should be taken with the least possibly delay. At the same time, I would caution those who may be responsible for its administration, if and when such an Executive order is issued, to make sure that no conflict occurs with respect to those States which have enacted permanent laws against discrimination in employment. Working arrangements between a Federal agency thus established and the agencies dealing with this matter in the several States should be adopted in the first instance, and nothing should be permitted to occur which in any way will undermine or handicap the efforts of these States to combat discrimination in employment.

There may be some who will question the advisability or expediency of urging this type of legislation at this time. They may feel that action of this kind will be detrimental to the defense program.

I do not agree with this viewpoint. Just as the fair-employment practices order contributed so much to national unity and all-out effort in the last war, so is a similar order now most appropriate. Just as there is thorough justification for the adoption of a policy or plan of this nature temporarily, so there is equal justification for such a program on a permanent basis.

If we and our allies have been fighting for anything in Korea, we have been fighting to defend and preserve freedom and justice in the world. If freedom and justice mean anything, they mean the right of everyone to equal opportunity to earn a living according to his ability and regardless of his parentage or religious faith.

Freedom and justice are part and parcel of our American creed. Those of us who are sponsoring this bill seek thereby to help make our American creed a living reality and thus more fully to establish at home observance of the ideals and principles for which we profess to stand among the nations of the world.

ADMISSION OF ALIEN SPOUSES AND MINOR CHILDREN OF CITIZEN MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to permit the admission of alien spouses and minor children of citizen members of the Armed Forces and I ask unanimous consent to make a 1-minute statement in connection therewith.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred and, without objection, the Senator from Nevada may proceed.

The bill (S. 552) to amend Public Law 717 of the Eighty-first Congress to permit the admission of alien spouses and minor children of citizen members of the United States Armed Forces, introduced by Mr. McCARRAN, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in the course of the Eighty-first Congress I introduced and there was enacted a bill (S. 1858) which waived the exclusion provisions of our immigration laws relating to inadmissibility because of race in the case of alien spouses and minor children of United States citizens serving in or having been honorably discharged from the Armed Forces of the United States.

Under the provisions of this law which was passed by the Eighty-first Congress, the marriage between the United States citizen and the alien spouse must occur prior to February 19, 1951, in order for the alien spouse and minor children to benefit from the provisions of the law. The purpose of the bill which I have just introduced is to extend the operative effect of the act so that the provisions of the original law may be available in cases in which the marriage occurs before 12 months after the enactment of the instant bill. The provisions of the law would thus be available to alien spouses and minor children of our soldiers who are engaged in the Korean conflict.

INCREASED ALLOWANCES FOR DEPENDENTS OF CERTAIN MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide that the pay of the soldiers serving in Korea and in other parts of the globe be increased by $50 a month. At the present time, a soldier who has a wife and two children receives the sum of $107 a month. Manifestly, with the increased cost of living, with the rise in price of bread, butter, coffee, food of all kinds, and other things the average family needs, such a family cannot live decently on $107 a month. I therefore ask in this bill that the pay be increased by $50 additional, to be paid entirely by the Government.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill, together with a statement I have prepared explaining the measure, be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the bill and statement will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill (S. 565) to increase by $50 per month the allowances provided for dependents of enlisted personnel in active service in the Armed Forces, and for other purposes, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That (a) for the duration of section 3 of the Dependents Assistance Act of 1950 (Public Law 771, 81st Cong.), the table of monthly basic allowances for quarters for enlisted members in pay grades E–1 to E–7, inclusive, prescribed by such section is amended to read as follows:

	Not over 2 dependents	Over 2 dependents
E–7	$117.50	$135
E–6	117.50	135
E–5	117.50	135
E–4	117.50	135

	1 dependent	2 dependents	Over 2 dependents
E–3	$95	$117.50	$135
E–1	95	117.50	135

(b) For the duration of section 9 of the Dependents Assistance Act of 1950, the fourth proviso of section 515 (b) of such act of October 12, 1949, is amended to read as follows: "Provided further, That when a member is furnished Government quarters adequate for himself and his dependents, the total sum saved for him by this subsection shall be reduced at the rate of $95 per month for members in pay grades E–1, E–2, E–3, and E–4 (less than 7 years' service) and $117.50 per month for members in pay grades E–4 (7 or more years' service), E–5, E–6, and E–7."

SEC. 2. The amendments made by this act shall be effective on the first day of the first calendar month beginning after the date of enactment of this act.

The statement presented by Mr. LANGER is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR LANGER

The purpose of the bill is to assist dependents of enlisted personnel in active service in the Armed Forces in meeting increased costs of living by increasing by $50 a month the allowances provided for such dependents. As increased by the bill, the amounts payable for enlisted men in the first three grades would be $95 where there is only one dependent, $117.50 where there are two dependents, and $135 where there are more than two dependents. Dependents of enlisted men in grades 4 to 7, inclusive, would receive $117.50 a month where there are not more than two dependents and $135 a month where there are more than two dependents. These amounts are furnished by the Government in addition to any amounts furnished by the serviceman himself.

OPERATIONS UNDER CERTAIN MINERAL LEASES COVERING SUBMERGED LANDS OF CONTINENTAL SHELF

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] and myself, I introduce for appropriate reference a joint resolution to provide for the continuation of operations under certain mineral leases issued by the respective States covering submerged lands of the Continental Shelf, and I ask unanimous consent that I may make a brief statement in connection therewith.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the Senator from Wyoming may proceed.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 20) to provide for the continuation of operations under certain mineral leases issued by the respective States covering submerged lands of the Continental Shelf, to encourage the continued development of such leases, to provide for the protection of the interests of the United States in the oil and gas deposits of said lands, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. O'MAHONEY (for himself and Mr. ANDERSON), was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, this measure is a modification of a joint resolution which I introduced during the last session of Congress. Hearings upon the joint resolution were held by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, but it was impossible to secure action because the Supreme Court had not then acted upon the case United States against Texas and the case of the United States against Louisiana. Those cases were determined on the fifth of June by a decision of the Supreme Court which was in harmony with the decision rendered in the prior case of the United States against the State of California. In all three of these cases the paramount authority of the United States over the submerged lands was asserted by the Supreme Court.

Operations off the California coast have been continued under stipulation between the Federal Government and the State of California. No stipulation has been made with Texas and Louisiana. With respect to oil operations off their coasts the Secretary of the Interior has issued a 60-day operating permit so that producers would not have to shut-in their wells. These arrangements, however, are only temporary in character, and the Secretary of the Interior has held that he is without authority to administer the submerged oil lands except under the inherent authority invested in his office to prevent waste of Federal property.

Petroleum is one of the two basic strategic materials for both industry and war—the other being steel. Approximately two-thirds of the world's petroleum reserves are outside the boundaries of the United States. It is, therefore, of the utmost importance to the Nation that in the present international emergency, authority be speedily granted to the Government to administer these lands.

The controversy which has existed between the States and the Federal Government over the control of the submerged lands should not be permitted, in the opinion of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] and myself, to prevent continued development and exploration in these areas. The purpose of our resolution, therefore, is to provide interim authority for exploration and development while Congress is considering permanent legislation.

It would be unwise to await the enactment of such permanent legislation because the companies which have received and have been operating valid leases on submerged lands under the authority of the States are now unable to risk the investment of the large sums necessary to explore for and produce petroleum from deposits under the seas. These operating companies have already invested over $250,000,000 in operations in the Gulf of Mexico, and additional millions have been invested in operations off the coast of California.

Production amounting to 1,300,000 barrels a month in the case of California, and 480,000 barrels a month in the Gulf of Mexico, has already been developed by the operators. With no rule of law governing payment of rents and royalties, and only a temporary arrangement for production, there can be little argument against the need for immediate enactment of interim legislation so that the oil may continue to be produced and exploration undertaken in those submerged areas which have not yet been tested.

Under the Supreme Court decree in the Texas and Louisiana cases the States are not accountable for rents and royalties received prior to June 5, 1950. Without interim legislation, uncertainty as to payments subsequent to that date would necessarily mean an end to operation. Neither the Secretary of the Interior nor the States, nor, indeed, the companies operating under State leases, should be allowed to remain in the present legal vacuum in which only one thing is certain, namely, that Federal authority is paramount in the submerged lands.

The resolution provides that oil and gas leases issued by the States prior to December 21, 1948, which were in force and effect on June 5, 1950, may continue to be operated, except that all such leases will terminate within 5 years in the absence of production or drilling operations.

The resolution has no application to navigable inland waters within the boundary of any State. It therefore does not apply to any of the lands covered by the claims of the city of Long Beach, Calif., which are landward of the line established in the stipulation between the Attorney General of the United States and the attorney general of California. The resolution, however, does not attempt to determine what submerged lands on the seaward side of this line are in fact navigable inland waters to which the Federal Government has no title.

In order to cover the conditions which might arise in the event of a controversy as to whether a particular area of submerged lands is inside or outside the jurisdiction of a State, this resolution authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to make special agreements with the States or the lessee of the States for oil and gas operations, and for the payment and the handling of rents and royalties.

In view of the urgent need for the exploration of oil and gas, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, pending the enactment of permanent legislation, to issue leases on areas of the Continental Shelf not now under lease. These leases are to be issued at competitive bidding for a period of 5 years and as long as oil and gas is produced at a royalty of not less than 12½ percent.

Bonuses, rents, royalties, and other funds payable in connection with the issuance and operation of all leases, except as to moneys received under an agreement authorized to be made with any State with respect to whether disputed lands are beneath navigable inland waters, would be deposited by the Secretary of the Interior in a special fund in the United States Treasury. Payments out of this fund would be made to the States on the basis of 37½ percent on all the receipts from areas within their seaward boundaries. Although the Supreme Court decision held that the paramount rights of the Federal Government cover all the lands seaward of the low-tide mark, State boundaries of the coastal States have traditionally extended 3 miles seaward. This provision for the payment of 37½ percent of the receipts to the States from operations within the State boundaries goes, therefore, beyond the holding of the Supreme Court. The balance of all receipts would be held in a special fund to await the enactment of permanent legislation.

Submerged lands of the Continental Shelf seaward of the State boundaries may be leased by the Secretary of the Interior. The resolution contains no provision for any payment of royalty to the coastal States from production in this area. This is because the lands seaward of the boundaries were never claimed by the States prior to the controversy, and the Federal claim to the resources of this area was established only as recently as September 28, 1945, by the proclamation of President Harry S. Truman. In international law, national sovereignty traditionally did not extend beyond the 3-mile limit, a boundary fixed in the days of sailing ships when the range of a cannon was 3 miles.

In view of the national emergency, it is also provided that the President may withdraw from disposition any of the unleased lands of the Continental Shelf and reserve them for the use of the United States in the interest of national security. In time of war, or when the President so prescribes, the United States shall have a prior right to purchase at the market price the oil and gas produced from the lands affected by the act. It is also provided that upon the recommendation of the Secretary of Defense during war or national emergency, operations under any lease may be suspended or any lease terminated provided that the lessee shall be compensated according to law.

Inasmuch as many applications have been made to the Federal Government in the past for leases under the Mineral Leasing Act of February 25, 1920, the resolution also contains a section providing that it shall not affect whatever rights, if any, such a prior applicant may have acquired under the law at the time of application.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the joint resolution I have introduced be printed at length in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection the text of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 20) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas certain mineral leases on submerged lands of the Continental Shelf were issued by coastal States under claim of ownership by such issuing States, and lessees have expended large sums of money in conducting operations under such leases; and

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States on June 23, 1947, rendered an opinion in the case of United States v. California and on June 5, 1950, rendered opinions in the cases of United States v. Louisiana and United States v. Texas, holding that the United States has paramount rights in, and full dominion and power over, the submerged lands of the Continental Shelf adjacent to the shores of California, Louisiana, and Texas, and that the respective States do not own the submerged lands of the Continental Shelf within their boundaries; and

Whereas it is in the national interest and important to national defense in the present emergency that the orderly development of the oil and gas deposits in the submerged lands of the Continental Shelf should continue without interruption, and in view of the time required for consideration and enactment of permanent legislation covering the exploration, development, production, and conservation of the oil and gas deposits in the submerged lands of the Continental Shelf, thus making it essential that this resolution be enacted in order to protect the interests of the United States pending the enactment of permanent legislation by the Congress respecting the submerged lands of the Continental Shelf; Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That (a) the provisions of this section shall apply to all mineral leases covering submerged lands of the Continental Shelf issued by any State or political subdivision or grantee thereof (including any extension, renewal, or replacement thereof heretofore granted pursuant to such lease or under the law of such State) provided—

(1) That such lease or a true copy thereof shall have been filed with the Secretary by the lessee or his duly authorized agent within 90 days from the effective date of this resolution, or within such further period or periods as may be fixed from time to time by the Secretary;

(2) That such lease was issued (i) prior to December 21, 1948, and was on June 5, 1950, in force and effect in accordance with its terms and provisions and the law of the State issuing it, or (ii) with the approval of the Secretary and was on the effective date of this resolution in force and effect in accordance with its terms and provisions and the law of the State issuing it;

(3) That within the time specified in paragraph (1) of this subsection there shall have been filed with the Secretary (i) a certificate issued by the State official or agency having jurisdiction and stating that the lease was in force and effect as required by the provisions of paragraph (2) of this subsection or (ii) in the absence of such certificate, evidence in the form of affidavits, receipts, canceled checks, or other documents, and the Secretary shall determine whether such lease was so in force and effect;

(4) That except as otherwise provided in section 3 hereof, all rents, royalties, and other sums payable under such a lease between June 5, 1950, and the effective date of this resolution, which have not been paid in accordance with the provisions thereof, and all rents, royalties, and other sums payable under such a lease after the effective date of this resolution shall be paid to the Secretary, who shall deposit them in a special fund in the Treasury to be disposed of as hereinafter provided;

(5) That the holder of such lease certifies that such lease shall continue to be subject to the overriding royalty obligations existing on the effective date of this resolution;

(6) That such lease was not obtained by fraud or misrepresentation;

(7) That such lease, if issued on or after June 23, 1947, was issued upon the basis of competitive bidding;

(8) That such lease provides for a royalty to the lessor of not less than 12½ percent in amount or value of the production saved, removed, or sold from the lease: Provided, however, That if the lease provides for a lesser royalty, the holder thereof may bring it within the provisions of this paragraph by consenting in writing, filed with the Secretary, to the increase of the royalty to the minimum herein specified;

(9) That such lease will terminate within a period of not more than 5 years from the effective date of this resolution in the absence of production or operations for drilling: Provided, however, That if the lease provides for a longer period, the holder thereof may bring it within the provisions of this paragraph by consenting in writing, filed with the Secretary, to the reduction of such period, so that it will not exceed the maximum period herein specified; and

(10) That the holder of such lease furnishes such surety bond, if any, as the Secretary may require and complies with such other requirements as the Secretary may deem to be reasonable and necessary to protect the interests of the United States.

(b) Any person holding a mineral lease which comes within the provisions of subsection (a) of this section, as determined by the Secretary, may continue to maintain such lease, and may conduct operations thereunder, in accordance with its provisions for the full term thereof and of any extension, renewal, or replacement authorized therein or heretofore authorized by the law of the State issuing such lease. A negative determination under this subsection may be made by the Secretary only after giving to the holder of the lease notice and an opportunity to be heard.

(c) With respect to any mineral lease that is within the scope of subsection (a) of this section, the Secretary shall exercise such powers of supervision and control as may be vested in the lessor by law or the terms and provisions of the lease.

(d) The permission granted in subsection (b) of this section shall not be construed to be a waiver of such claims, if any, as the United States may have against the lessor or the lessee or any other person respecting sums payable or paid for or under the lease, or respecting activities conducted under the lease, prior to the effective date of this resolution.

SEC. 2. The Secretary is authorized, with the approval of the Attorney General of the United States and upon the application of any person holding a mineral lease issued by or under the authority of a State on tidelands or submerged lands beneath navigable inland waters within the boundaries of such State, to certify that the United States does not claim any proprietary interest in such lands or in the mineral deposits within them. The authority granted in this section shall not apply to rights of the United States in lands (a) which have been lawfully acquired by the United States from any State, either at the time of its admission into the Union or thereafter, or from any person in whom such rights had vested under the law of a State or under a treaty or other arrangement between the United States and a foreign power, or otherwise, or from a grantee or successor in interest of a State or such person; or (b) which were owned by the United States at the time of the admission of a State into the Union and which were expressly retained by the United States; or (c) which the United States lawfully holds under the law of the State in which the lands are situated; or (d) which are held by the United States in trust for the benefit of any person or persons, including any tribe, band, or group of Indians or for individual Indians.

SEC. 3. In the event of a controversy between the United States and a State as to whether or not lands are submerged lands beneath navigable inland waters, the Secretary is authorized, notwithstanding the provisions of subsections (a) and (c) of section 1 of this resolution, and with the concurrence of the Attorney General of the United States, to negotiate and enter into an agreement with the State or a lessee of the State, its political subdivision or grantee, respecting operations under existing mineral leases and payment and impounding of rents, royalties, and other sums payable thereunder, or with the State respecting the issuance of new mineral leases pending the settlement or adjudication of the controversy: Provided, however, That the authorization contained in this section shall not be construed to be a limitation upon the authority conferred on the Secretary in other sections of this resolution. Payments made pursuant to such agreement, or pursuant to any stipulation between the United States and a State, shall be considered as compliance with section 1 (a) (4) hereof. Upon the termination of such agreement or stipulation by reason of the final settlement or adjudication of such controversy, if the lands subject to any mineral lease are determined to be in whole or in part submerged land of the Continental Shelf, the lessee, if he had not already done so, shall comply with the requirements of section 1 (a), and thereupon the provisions of section 1 (b) shall govern such lease.

SEC. 4. (a) In order to meet the urgent need during the present emergency for further exploration and development of the oil and gas deposits in the submerged lands of the Continental Shelf, the Secretary is authorized, pending the enactment of further legislation on the subject, to grant to the qualified persons offering the highest bonuses on a basis of competitive bidding oil and gas leases on submerged lands of the Continental Shelf which are not covered by leases within the scope of subsection (a) of section 1 of this resolution.

(b) A lease issued by the Secretary pursuant to this section shall cover such area as the Secretary may determine, shall be for a period of 5 years and as long thereafter as oil or gas may be produced from the area in paying quantities, shall require the payment of a royalty of not less than 12½ percent, and shall contain such rental provisions and such other terms and provisions as the Secretary may by regulation prescribe in advance of offering the area for lease.

(c) All moneys paid to the Secretary for or under leases granted pursuant to this section shall be deposited in a special fund in the Treasury to be disposed of as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 5. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section:

(1) 37½ percent of all moneys received as bonus payments, rents, royalties and other sums payable with respect to operations in submerged coastal lands lying within the seaward boundary of any State shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to such State within 90 days after the expiration of each fiscal year;

(2) all other moneys received under the provisions of this act shall be held in a special account in the Treasury pending the enactment of legislation by the Congress concerning the disposition thereof.

(b) The provisions of this section shall not apply to moneys received and held pursuant to any stipulation or agreement referred to in section 3 of this resolution pending the settlement or adjudication of the controversy.

(c) If and whenever the United States shall take and receive in kind all or any part of the royalty under a lease maintained or issued under the provisions of the act and covering submerged coastal lands lying within the seaward boundary of any State, the value of such royalty so taken in kind shall, for the purpose of subsection (a)(1) of this section, be deemed to be the prevailing market price thereof at the time and place of production, and there shall be paid to the State entitled thereto 37½ percent of the value of such royalty.

SEC. 6. The Secretary is authorized to issue such regulations as he may deem to be necessary or advisable in performing his functions under this resolution.

SEC. 7. (a) The President may, from time to time, withdraw from disposition any of the unleased lands of the Continental Shelf and reserve them for the use of the United States in the interest of national security.

(b) In time of war, or when the President shall so prescribe, the United States shall have the right of first refusal to purchase at the market price all or any portion of the oil and gas produced from the submerged lands covered by this act.

(c) All leases issued under this act, and leases, the maintenances and operation of which are authorized under this act, shall contain or be construed to contain a provision whereby authority is vested in the Secretary, upon the recommendation of the Secretary of Defense, during a state of war or national emergency declared by the Congress or the President after the effective date of this act, to suspend operations under, or to terminate any lease; and all such leases shall contain or be construed to contain provisions for the payment to the lessee whose operations are thus suspended or whose lease is thus terminated of an amount determined by due process of law.

SEC. 8. Nothing herein contained shall affect any rights that may have been acquired under any law of the United States by any person on lands subject to this resolution and any such rights shall be governed by the law in effect at the time they may have been acquired.

SEC. 9. When used in this resolution, (a) the term "submerged lands of the Continental Shelf" means the lands (including the oil, gas, and other minerals therein) underlying the sea and situated outside the ordinary low water mark on the coast of the United States and outside the inland waters and extending seaward to the outer edge of the Continental Shelf; (b) the term "seaward boundary of a State" shall mean a line 3 miles distant from the points at which the paramount rights of the Federal Government in the submerged lands begin; (c) the term "mineral lease" means any form of authorization for the exploration, development or production of oil, gas, or other minerals; (d) the term "tidelands" means lands regularly covered and uncovered by the flow and the ebb of the tides; and (e) the term "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Interior.

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING—AMENDMENTS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas (by request) (for himself, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. CHAPMAN, Mr. KEFAUVER, Mr. HUNT, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. BRIDGES, Mr. SALTONSTALL, Mr. MORSE, Mr. KNOWLAND, Mr. CAIN, and Mr. FLANDERS) submitted amendments in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to the bill (S. 1) to provide for the common defense by establishing a universal training program, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Armed Services and ordered to be printed.

By Mr. FREAR, from the Committee on Banking and Currency:

William H. Harrison, of New York, to be Defense Production Administrator.

IMPORTANCE OF ADEQUATE MEDICAL CARE

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article by Mr. Bernard DeVoto, entitled "Letter to a Family Doctor," which appeared in the January issue of Harper's magazine, be set forth in the RECORD following the conclusion of these remarks.

I know I need not remind my colleagues of the continuing importance of the problem of assuring adequate medical care to all the American people. The President of the United States has just stressed the great role it plays in this critical period. The international situation in which we now find ourselves makes it perhaps more important than ever before. I know, too, that everyone in the Congress is aware of the excellent character of Harper's magazine and of Mr. DeVoto's reputation for perspicacity, clarity, and intellectual integrity. The combination of these factors has resulted in an article which, I believe, should be read with care, not only by Members of the Congress, but by every doctor in the country. Mr. DeVoto has pointed out in no uncertain terms the altogether indefensible position into which members of one of America's most noble professions are being led as a result of entrusting the determination of their public relations, their legislative activities, and their political thinking to a team of hucksters whose outstanding characteristic seems to be a complete disregard of their obligations as citizens or as purveyors of truth. Unless the doctors of America quickly awaken to what is being done in their name, they will inevitably find themselves regarded, not as members of a profession deserving of respect and trust, but as members of a blindly selfish, socially irresponsible, politically unsavory pressure group. I know that as individuals our men of medicine do not deserve any such classification. Nonetheless, as a group they are rapidly earning it because of the activities carried out in their names by Clem Whitaker and his wife. Because of my continued faith in the integrity of our physicians as individuals, I sincerely hope that they will not only read Mr. DeVoto's article with care, but will so act as to put an immediate halt to the processes he so justifiably indicts.

In closing, I should like to reiterate my oft-repeated plea to the doctors of America that they eschew the irrational distrust of their own government which their leaders are attempting to thrust upon them. I urge that, instead, they sit down with those of us who are concerned with the economics of medicine and in good faith attempt to work out with us means whereby the great benefits which they have to offer may be made available to all of our people, through measures which will be in keeping with the self-respect that characterizes the citizens of our country, and which will, at the same time, guarantee the preservation of all the rights and privileges of the profession.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LETTER TO A FAMILY DOCTOR

(By Bernard DeVoto)

DEAR DOCTOR JAY: My check for $14.45 accompanies this letter. I have taken two deductions from the $15 for which you billed me. The first one, 30 cents, is the 2 percent for current payment customary in commercial transactions; business ethics, I gather, now govern our relationship. I will explain the remaining 25 cents in a moment.

I fully understand why you have been forced to raise your fee for house calls from $10 to $15, though I am not able to adjust my own professional fees so readily to the rise in living costs. I am still being paid for the easy chair just what I was getting in June 1946 when I wrote a piece attacking the antivivisectionists for which you and about a thousand other medical men wrote me letters of approval. (Many of them phrased so similarly as to suggest that someone had sent out word to give me a hand.) Still, though my income is not large enough to enable me to pay for my children's education this year without dipping into savings, I realize that it is large enough to put me, statistically, in the topmost 5 percent of Americans. I am therefore glad to send you the $15, less deductions, as payment for your treatment of my son's cold plus my share of your treatment of others who cannot afford your full fee or perhaps any of it. The 95 percent of my fellow-countrymen who are less able than I to afford medical treatment thrust themselves on my attention. I will help American medicine take care of them—as long as I can.

I do not know how long that will be. This month the hospital to whose staff you belong asked me to contribute to its endowment drive. The last time it did so I sent what was for me a thumping big check, much larger than I could really afford. I would be glad to contribute now, all the more glad because of the magnificent care I received during the 3 weeks I spent there last April. But this year I cannot afford to give the hospital a dime. One reason, besides taxes and the inflation, is that the cost of those 3 weeks, the fee of the surgeon who operated on me, and the loss of income while I was convalescing used up all my margin. The chairman of the drive tells me that it is going to fall far short of its goal; many people on whom it could once depend for contributions can no longer afford them. He, you, and I all know how grave a danger this is to the hospital, to your profession, and to the public. Who is going to pay the hospitals' deficits and who is going to support its medical research now that we of the middle class no longer can? I understand your trade association, the AMA, to say that though it cannot answer that question it will not permit the Government to pay for them.

I thank you for the publicity matter which you enclosed with your statement. I am especially glad to have the copy of Dr. Elmer L. Henderson's inaugural address, Medical Progress Versus Political Medicine. I understand that in sending me this material you were helping in the crusade which Messrs. Whitaker and Baxter outlined for you in A Simplified Blueprint of the Campaign Against Compulsory Health Insurance. You must, they tell you there, "do double duty until this issue is resolved." You must, they say, "help in treating the ills of the body politic." But I must tell you that as part of the body politic I do not think you are qualified either to diagnose or to treat such illnesses, and I know that advertising agencies will make any diagnosis asked for on a fee-for-service basis.

Your proprietary advertising reached me opportunely. I was following the ads which you were running in the Boston newspapers. I found them dishonest, and they further annoyed me by the copywriter's assumption that I am a fool. But they harmonized well with the ads on the opposite page, which were trying to sell me water from a radium spring that is guaranteed to cure everything from impotence to cancer. They set out to rouse the same fears to the same ends. Your radio commercials interested me too. Little dramatic sketches presented you as the old family doctor, with the nobility and self-sacrifice which copywriters now have you wearing like a streetwalker's smile, and assured me that you were guarding my health (without fee, the implication was) and simultaneously protecting me from political enslavement. I observed that as soon as you signed off, another little drama came on. There was a woman who was very, very tired. She was so exhausted and suffered so much from backache that she could not greet her husband with the loving eagerness which alone could save their marriage. It turned out that she needed the dollar economy-size of a cathartic which acts painlessly, and I rejoiced that the advertising agencies were saving freedom, monogamy, and peristalsis in the same half-hour.

You and a tobacco company will relieve throat irritation; you and Seneca snake oil will get rid of gallstones. Your advertising has already cost you a very great deal of the prestige which the advertising agency told you would put your campaign over. And it has radically changed the relationship between you and me. Your ads speak of the trust between physician and patient, so noble it says here, so sacred, so certain to be destroyed by what the propaganda calls socialism. But I do not like any kind of solicitation that trades on prestige or on such fears and hopes as illness necessarily involves, and I will not tolerate political solicitation in a relationship of trust. Solicitors who call at my house must use the back door.

My second deduction, the 25 cents, signifies that I will not help pay for the $25 assessment you sent to the AMA to run these ads and print these pamphlets. I will not help you finance distortion and demagoguery. In an envelope that has your name and degree on it you tell me by way of Dr. Henderson that all infectious diseases have been brought under effective methods of prevention, control, and treatment. I am to have no more colds, then, and my friend's daughter need not have died of poliomyelitis last summer. Cure guaranteed, Dr. Henderson's ad says in effect, and it was only through inadvertence that he did not mention the great increase in chronic diseases, especially among the elderly, and that he did not point out how our increased longevity makes more medical service necessary, not less. There is much further disingenuousness in his anthem of self-praise but let us pass over it. I am willing to grant him that on the whole the history of American medicine is a vibrant, continuing story of human progress. But when you follow him into a political agitation that is at once arrogant, insolent, and dishonest, someone has got to call you.

"It is," the two of you say, "the administrative arm of our Government in Washington which has failed us in this generation—a government which is sick with intellectual dishonesty, with avarice, with moral laxity, and with reckless excesses." You say that to me when you send me his speech, Doctor. You sound like Mr. Vishinsky, and that eloquent rabble-rouser was surely pleased by your allusion to "the totalitarian plan which Washington directs and the people pay for." You and Dr. Henderson are to be highlighted in your nobility against the Government's viciousness, and I am to rejoice that, all other moral heroisms having been defeated, yours will keep us free. And the conspiracy, though so powerful, is so small. You tell me that the people who do not stand on the AMA's party line are "a comparatively small group of little men—little men whose lust for power is far out of proportion to their intellectual capacity, their spiritual understanding, their economic realism, or their political honesty." Expert hysterical rabble-rousing, Doctor, and you add, "Their real objective is to gain control over all fields of human endeavor. Their real objective is to strip the American people of self-determination and self-government and make them a Socialist state in the pathetic pattern of the socially and economically bankrupt nations of Europe which we, the American people, are seeking to rescue from poverty and oppression." You go on to say that the issue is "whether we are to become a Socialist state, under the yoke of a government bureaucracy, dominated by selfish, cynical men who believe the American people are no longer competent to care for themselves." You and Dr. Henderson and his publicity adviser, from your advertising agency I suppose, appear to believe that the American people are no longer competent to think for themselves. But you make me wonder how competent you are.

Much might be said about this delirious rant, which would have landed Dr. Henderson before the Un-American Activities Committee if it had been circulated by a group of excited college boys who had just heard of Marx. One thing is this: You and Dr. Henderson are saying what is not so. Another is this: Dr. Henderson acquires no immunity by wrapping the flag round the vested interest of the AMA's bureaucracy and trustees. Your acquiescence in his claptrap withdraws you from my respect but I take it to be a consequence of the fact that you have not done much thinking about the subject he is misrepresenting. Medicine is your field, not economics, sociology, or government. You come innocent and virginal to social thinking. It is a fair bet that, like thousands of other physicians whose rage Dr. Henderson is whipping up, you have not even read the bills for compulsory payroll deductions for medical insurance which, after all, are what he is talking about. You probably do not know what the bills say, and you had to work so hard on biochemistry at college that you did not learn to detect the propaganda in such phrases as "socialized medicine," "statism," "socialism," and "totalitarianism." With what valorous stupidity you charge head down at those red rags—and all they are concealing is certain bills which would require some people to take out medical insurance. Bills that are an admittedly clumsy attempt to remedy an intolerable situation which your trade association refuses to face realistically and which, it makes clear, must be solved without its help.

You are a busy man, I know. You have not got time to find out for yourself, though every day you see some of the conditions that the bills are trying to alleviate. So you check your intelligence with the AMA, whose refusal to do anything grows more reactionary as conditions grow more alarming. And with your intelligence and your $25 in its pocket, the AMA systematically distorts the facts and misrepresents the conditions to you. You docilely swallow the cure-guaranteed elixir which your propagandists prescribe. And, docile to them but truculent to me, you send me Dr. Henderson's nonsense and forfeit your status.

A friend of mine, a Vermonter, has a useful locution. He does not say, "Joe is a damned fool." Knowing the mixed nature of the human being and the fallibility of human judgment, he says instead, "Joe puts me in mind of a damned fool." What you put me in mind of, Doctor, is a sap.

You had better stop acting like a sap. Our constitutionally elected Government, which has to do something about an increasingly alarming social situation that the AMA refuses to deal with at all except on its own long-obsolete terms—do you really think it is what Dr. Henderson says it is? You had better think again, fast and hard. And this pamphlet called "Old Doc Truman's Pink Pills." Have you read it, Doctor? Take the passage that begins on page 27. It equates the Democrats, the party which a majority of our citizens have maintained in power, with Communists, and in doing so it makes some of the most scabrous and feculent statements I have ever seen in print. Its distributors have learned a little caution, but not much, from the public outrage that followed the notorious "Dear Christian Colleague" letter which one of your propaganda organizations sent out. As it describes the plot of various committees and learned foundations to deliver medicine and the United States over to Stalin, it insistently repeats Jewish names. It never quite says right out that the Democrat-Communist plot is a Jewish plot but it is so written as to make many a reader believe that it is. Thus it arrives at a standard technique of totalitarianism: Anti-Semitism. Do you accept responsibility for this? You will be held responsible. I got the pamphlet from the office of your State medical society and the girl there said that it was for distribution to patients. You paid the $25 assessment. The noble old family friend has corrupted the relationship of trust with anti-Semitism.

I know that you, personally, do not approve of this, but there it is. Thousands of your colleagues do not, either, and still there it is. Take a tumble to yourself.

And take a tumble to your leaders. Dr. Henderson says that in three more years 90,000,000 people will be enrolled in voluntary health-insurance plans and that "when that number has been reached the problem will be largely resolved." Even if his wild guess should prove accurate, and even if all those voluntary plans should prove adequate, will the problem be "largely resolved"? Dr. Henderson will be satisfied if the remaining 40 percent of the population are without insurance; will you be satisfied? And are you sure that the AMA will support the voluntary plans which it is now praising? For years it opposed voluntary health insurance as violently as it now opposes pay-roll deductions. Twenty-six State medical societies, I make it, have sponsored legislation which limits such plans to those that are controlled wholly by physicians. That is, plans in which neither the public nor the subscriber has effective power. Many medical societies have threatened disciplinary action—up to measures which would make practice impossible—against any of their members who participate in any other kind of plan. Some have been convicted of conspiracy in restraint of trade—which is a crime, Doctor—and others are under indictment for such interference with voluntary prepayment plans. The AMA has fought hard against comprehensive prepayment plans. It has tried to kill those that have succeeded. On the showing so far is it honest about voluntary insurance or is it throwing dust in my eyes and yours?

Like a lot of physicians, a lot of us laymen are fed to the teeth with the AMA's methods. With its persistently negative approach to everything. With its unvarying misrepresentation of the efforts other countries are making to solve the problem. With its "crusade" and its "battle" and its vilification of the Government, the public, and its own members who speak out. With its uniformly misleading attack on "Government medicine." Everyone in the military services is under a system of "Government medicine"; so is everyone in a veterans' hospital or receiving out-patient treatment from one. The Public Health Service is "Government medicine." Several thousand of your colleagues who have had the best training available are practicing "Government medicine." Are they venal, inferior, and suppressed?

One of your ads listed "damage to research" among the ills certain to follow Government domination of the people's affairs under compulsory health insurance. What about that? The hospital which asked me for a contribution is carrying out fundamentally important researches that are being paid for by the Government. They are entirely in the hospital's hands. How have they been damaged? As a member of a committee of the National Research Council, you regularly go to Washington to appraise projects in medical research for which the Government is to pay. Your committee is composed exclusively of medical men who are not in the Government service. You decide whether a project is valuable and how much ought to be spent on it; the project then passes to representatives of the Government just long enough for them to allocate the money for it; it then passes entirely out of their hands and the Government has no more to do with it till private medicine has finished the job. Why do you submit to a patent misrepresentation? Why do you try to deceive me?

The advertising, propaganda, and vilification which the AMA conducts is steadily, and now seriously, undermining your professional standing and prestige. The public very much needs both. The traditional system of medical practice has burst its seams; it is now inadequate and outworn. We are going to have something different. No matter what your propagandists say, it is certain to be not a single system but multiple and mixed. And there is no chance whatever that the AMA will get what it demands—no chance that the mixed system will be developed and administered solely by doctors. This is a public matter, a community and national matter. It requires innumerable skills which medical men simply have not got, and it must be under the unremitting scrutiny of representatives of the public with power to act. Medical knowledge is only one of many kinds of knowledge that are required for social action.

But you and your colleagues can shape the future of American medicine if you will accept the responsibility. If you study the problem and act to solve it, not to prevent its being solved. If you turn back the AMA's headlong opposition to every change not approved by the extremely small group of men who enforce its reactionary policy on its whole membership. (Is there no lust for power on the top level of the AMA? And how much of this policy is designed to secure to a very few men the largest possible incomes while the average income of medical men is smaller than it would be if people could afford to pay their doctors' bills?) If you stop acting like a sap, then you can count on shaping the solution. But time passes, the problem grows more desperate all the time, and a solution will be worked out somehow—with, without, or in spite of you. It had better be with your help.

Desperate social problems have to be solved, Doctor; they are solved as needs must, if it comes to that. Even if we accept Dr. Henderson's figures, 40 percent of the population will have no insurance protection against medical expense. Of his 60 percent, only a part will have adequate insurance. Ward service in the hospital that is trying to raise funds now costs $10 a day, the cheapest room $18 a day. Last week in the out-patient department I saw a patient getting a prescription filled at a drug window. It called for six capsules of aureomycin a day for 10 days. The hospital was selling him the capsules at cost, 40 cents apiece, $24. If his job paid him $40 a week, he could not afford them. In that case the hospital would give them to him, but the hospital had to pay $24 for them—and it can no longer get its deficits paid by contribution. Yet aureomycin is cheap compared to certain other remedies which medical research—in part supported by Government appropriation—has developed. How could he afford ACTH, or the hospital afford it for him?

There are other considerations, too. You know that, in spite of what your advertising says, the only places where American medicine can fully live up to its possibilities are the teaching hospitals. You know that elsewhere it is not doing as well as it wants to and must. You know that there are many areas inadequately provided with doctors, hospitals, and the proper equipment for tests, treatment, and research. You know that some doctors are not well enough trained—with the cost of training climbing before your eyes—and that some hospitals are not good enough—with the cost of making them better steadily mounting.

You know, too, that thousands of physicians disapprove of the AMA policy, are alarmed by it, and want to substitute for it one which will enable the profession to grapple successfully with all these problems. And you know that the hard facts of a rapidly changing world are forcing thousands of other physicians into activities—contract practice is one of them—which the AMA condemns. You know that many thousands of your colleagues agree with Dr. James Howard Means, who is not a Communist, who I think is not a Democrat, either, but who is chief of medicine at a great hospital and professor of clinical medicine at a great medical school. "A learned profession has sunk, or been dragged, in its political sphere, to a distressingly low level," Dr. Means wrote, and he went on: "What organized medicine needs * * * is a new and more enlightened leadership."

That puts it up to you, Doctor. For the campaign of what the AMA calls "public education," run by an advertising agency, you had better substitute one of self-education. You had better adopt the scientific attitude and find out what the facts are and what, besides propaganda, can be done about them. You might begin by reminding Dr. Henderson of his oath: "I shall strive constantly to maintain the ethics of the medical profession and to promote the public health and welfare." The public does not consider misrepresentation ethical. The AMA is not promoting public health and welfare by intimidating its members, trying to frighten laymen, lapsing into anti-Semitism, and accusing a Government which has also sworn to promote the public welfare of conspiring with Communists to stamp out freedom in the United States.

You can hold your leadership to proper ends, Doctor, or you can repudiate it. You have that option. But if you are to retain the public respect that has been yours, or if you are to do your part in guiding the future of medicine in the United States, you have no other choice.

QUICK GOVERNMENTAL ACTION IN CONNECTION WITH ATOMIC ENERGY PLANT NEAR PADUCAH, KY.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a gratifying example of how a Government agency can act with speed in the interests of our preparedness effort needs to be more generally known. When it is known, I believe it will be applauded.

By now it is generally known that the Atomic Energy Commission is locating a new plant near Paducah, Ky. The plant is one of the important steps in America's awakened preparedness.

The plant will require electric capacity of about 1,000,000 kilowatts. The capacity will be supplied by public and private utility interests. TVA will supply one-half million kilowatts, and a group of five private utility companies have cooperated to build a plant to supply the remaining one-half million.

The cooperation of our privately managed utility companies to construct this giant power source is heartening evidence that industrial America is ready to stand behind America's preparedness.

But there is more to the story. Several of the cooperating private utility companies are subject to the jurisdiction of the Securities and Exchange Commission. When they applied to the SEC to undertake that venture, the SEC, in view of the critical defense needs of the country, acted with speed appropriate to the necessity.

I should like to quote from the SEC's opinion approving the cooperative project. It is worth recording, as evidence that an awakened Government can cut red tape to accelerate our preparedness. The SEC said:

> Speed is of the essence. We have held no hearings and have created no formal record, other than the data contained in the application itself, as a basis for our interim order of approval. The statutes we administer are flexible enough and our philosophy of administration is sufficiently enlightened to permit us to handle first things first. Our first problem today is the speedy building of national defense. Projects such as electric energy are not business as usual, and merit postponement of regulation as usual until the more normal times which should follow the current emergency. Accordingly we have expedited this proceeding and have shelved for the present certain of the problems the application raises.

UTILIZATION OF NATION'S ENERGIES AND ASSETS TO MEET NATIONAL NEEDS

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, there are a good many ways of saying this, but it can do no harm to say it once as simply as possible: We, as a nation, are in a tough spot. Each passing day emphasizes, with new crises and foreboding, the deadly seriousness of the situation which confronts the Government and the people of the United States of America. Daily our leaders call upon the people to prepare for greater sacrifices. That is right and proper. We face a precarious future. We must be prepared for every eventuality.

As we gird ourselves for what may well be the decisive test as to whether representative government and individual freedom can survive, it is imperative that we take stock of our resources and consider what can be done both to conserve them and to expend them wisely. The fact that such consideration necessitates some reexamination of policy does not make it any less imperative.

We cannot afford to scatter our shots haphazardly. I make that statement, and to it everyone agrees; there is no dissent; and yet if we examine our record to date, even hastily, I am afraid we shall find we have scattered our shots over the entire globe without hitting many targets. When we look at the record, we find it stuffed with question marks, and the two most important questions are: Do we know where we are going? And if so, do we want to go there?

At a time when all-out mobilization is plainly requested and when time is of the essence in all our endeavors, it would be suicide to let bureaucratic inertia hamstring our efforts. Yet, Mr. President, I fear that is exactly what may be happening.

Now, if ever, it is proper for the Senate to inquire whether, as a nation, we are effectively and efficiently utilizing our entire energies and all our assets in meeting our national needs.

Early last September, in my capacity as chairman of the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Foreign Aid, I addressed similar letters to the Honorable Averell Harriman, assistant to the President, to the Secretaries of State and Defense, and to the Administrator of the ECA, in which I pointed out in some detail what I believed to be certain fundamental reasons why our economic-assistance program should be reexamined in the light of conditions existing at that time. I stressed the fact that if we continued certain types of ECA expenditure, which had been justified on the old basis of a peacetime economy, we might soon find ourselves in a position where we would wish that certain funds and certain materials had not been committed so that we might be free to inaugurate new projects, not previously foreseen but essential to our defense program.

Today the situation is even more critical than it was in September. Already we are feeling the pinch of material shortages. Our requirement of funds has far exceeded what we estimated would be needed at the time funds were made available for the operation of ECA.

Each day it becomes more apparent that we should direct our foreign aid toward providing only such materials as are needed by each recipient of such aid in maintaining an economy designed to produce the essentials of defense. No longer can we be guided chiefly by what our foreign friends need in order to increase their standards of living. The standard of living of the American people is being reduced daily. It must not be the only one sacrificed for defense. Other countries affected must also be willing to sacrifice their standards of living.

Time and again it has been said—I have said it myself, and it is painfully true—that a defense program cannot be imposed upon a broken-down economy. Much concern has been expressed by our European friends about the danger of defense to their economic recovery. It is time that someone expressed concern about the economy of the United States. I do not fear for our economy, if we plan realistically. I do fear for our economy, if we extend our commitments everywhere for all things. Our economy cannot survive a policy of our left hand not knowing what our right hand is doing. We must face the fact that we cannot give away what we do not have, unless we are at least sure where we are going to get it.

As it becomes necessary for our Government to restrict its citizens in the use of certain materials, such as copper and aluminum, it is our duty to inquire into the use of such materials which we supply, through the ECA, to our friends abroad.

It is altogether foolish to act as if the ECA is not supposed to know what items are on the critical list. Materials which are denied to our own producers and consumers should not be sent abroad, unless they are essentially needed for the defense of Europe. And it is manifestly unjust to allow the export of such materials, if they are to be used in Europe for purposes which are prohibited here at home. Such a course would only encourage the reexport of the end product back to the United States at increased prices for the American consumer. Such a course could only breed suspicion and dissatisfaction and lead toward an inevitable breakdown in our own economy.

In this connection, recent reports indicate that certain United States fabricators of aluminum have paid as much as 33 cents a pound for aluminum, whereas the American aluminum producer's price is only 18 cents a pound. When we see the Economic Cooperation Administration authorizing large sums for aluminum for the European countries, and then find from our examination of Commerce Department records that considerable quantities of raw aluminum, as well as aluminum sheets and bars, are being imported into the United States from some of the same European countries, it raises the basic question as to the proper screening of such programs.

The authorization by ECA of materials in such a category can no longer be justified by the old criteria of relative value in the export earnings of the countries of Europe. Such a situation, while it may be valuable to the foreign exchange condition of the importing and exporting country, results in a prohibitive cost to the American taxpayers and consumers who must pay the initial as well as the increased cost of such transactions.

Although our Government has rather rigidly allocated and controlled the domestic use of aluminum, ECA is still providing vast quantities of aluminum to Marshall-plan countries. Such authorizations can be justified only if the materials are necessary to our joint defense effort.

Numerous general statements have been made by various officials concerning the necessity for reviewing our recovery objectives and programs; but I can find little, if any, evidence that such review has actually occurred. Certainly there is no mobilization of European industry designed for defense production. Rather, there is generally "business as usual," with a growing reluctance to have anything interfere with the profit trend which has affected all European business since the beginning of the Korean war.

Mr. President, during a 6-month period ending last September, Western Europe's exports to the United States doubled in value. At the same time, exports of the participating countries' overseas dependent territories showed a trade surplus with the United States of $30,000,000 a month.

The lack of realism in our policy is emphasized by the news stories of a week or so ago indicating the reluctance of the French Government to prohibit the shipment of steel rails from France to Red China. An aroused public opinion, resulting from the news stories on this situation, may have accomplished what our officials were unable to secure; that is, the prohibition of such shipments in the future. The anomaly of such a situation, Mr. President, lies not so much in the shameful fact that the French would enter into such contracts with a barbaric aggressor, who even now threatens France's own overseas territory, but in the better evidence that our Government officials were unable to secure the cooperation of the French Government in such a situation, involving the mutual interests and the defense of both the United States and France.

It is ludicrous, but surely not laughable, that after our ECA officials learned they could not secure the cooperation necessary to stop the execution of these contracts, they have continued to provide economic assistance to France, even to the extent of approving a new project for increasing the French steel plate production at a cost to the United States of $4,500,000.

It is stated that this new project will aid France's rearmament program, and enable her to export larger quantities of steel plate to other Atlantic Pact nations. The accomplishment of that objective may well be the desire and intention of our ECA officials in approving the program; but—the point is, Mr. President, our officials seem to have demonstrated their inability to deal realistically with such a situation.

Having just failed to secure cooperation in a most reasonable request, to proceed on the assumption that everything in the future will be all right, if we only furnish more money and aid, seems to me to be either very stupid or unbelievably naive.

Mr. President, the path of cooperation envisioned by the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948 was a two-way street. The Congress in passing that act contemplated cooperation on the part of the recipients of Marshall-plan aid, as well as by the United States. The very word "cooperation" implies mutuality.

When sacrifices are necessary for a common purpose, they must be shared by all. Europe's standard of living may not be equal to America's; but that gives Europe no exemption from the necessity of sacrificing some of that which she has. On the contrary, Europe must bear her fair share of the burden, for this struggle is just as important to Europe as it is to the United States. Surely, no one will claim it is not fair to ask that Europe accept, with respect to these items for the procurement of which she asks our assistance, the same restrictions we enforce upon our own people.

The resources of the United States are not limitless, although we have tended to use them in the past as if they were. The Treasury of the United States is not a bottomless well, although our European friends continue to make calls upon it as if it were. Every dollar, every ounce of material, that the United States furnishes either for Europe or for our own use, must be provided, in the last analysis, by the American taxpayer and consumer. The time has come when we must avoid waste in every transaction.

The security and interest of the United States must be given a top priority in our aid programs, lest we come to the final test of our strength and be found wanting because we have frittered away our riches without knowing the road we traveled.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD, as a part of these remarks, a copy of my letter of September 12, 1950, to the Honorable Averell Harriman, together with the reply of the Economic Cooperation Administration thereto, under date of October 3, 1950.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of North Carolina in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEPTEMBER 12, 1950.

Hon. W. AVERELL HARRIMAN,
Assistant to the President,
The White House,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HARRIMAN: In my present position as chairman of the Subcommittee on Foreign Aid of the Senate Appropriations Committee, and in my former capacity as chairman of the Joint Committee on Foreign Economic Cooperation, I have felt concern that our expenditures for economic aid for Europe, since the fighting in Korea began, may not have been redirected so as to meet the new situation which has confronted the United States since June 25.

I refer this letter to you since the issue presented seems to me to be somewhat broader than the ECA program encompasses.

The action of the ECA on August 25, in approving the expenditure of $1,297,000 to provide American machinery for a pulp and paper mill to be built in Austria, seems to me to indicate the danger to which I refer.

The ECA has informed the staff of the subcommittee that this particular project is the fourth pulp and paper mill project approved this year for Austria and that it was approved for the same reasons that those projects approved prior to June 25 were accepted, this is, because expanding this industry would improve Austria's export position and help her balance of payments.

The ECA indicates that this particular project has not been examined by any military agency to determine whether the expenditure is justified because it will contribute to the defense of Western Europe, nor has there been any specific screening of this project to determine whether an investment of this kind, which will take at least 2 years to get into production, is desirable in view of its vulnerability to Russian aggression.

The ECA indicates that until United States export controls make necessary a new set of priorities for European industrial expansion, or until a general program for converting the industries of our European allies to defense production, the ECA will continue to furnish aid for the purpose of strengthening the economy of Europe, using the same standards for approval as have been used in the past.

This, it seems to me, raises a very fundamental issue on which the policy of the United States should be very clearly defined. The question is whether or not, in view of the distortion which we are causing in the American economy involving sacrifices by American consumers, in order to meet the requirements of our new defense effort, we should supply money and equipment to build or improve European industries which have not been adjusted or integrated to conform to a corresponding defense program on the other side of the Atlantic.

I am well aware that it is more difficult to prepare an economic and industrial program for the contribution of Western Europe to our common defense than it is to prepare such a program for our own country and that several months may elapse before such a program is ready. My point is that in order to conserve our resources in view of the enormous demands now being made upon them, we should postpone expenditures for industrial construction in Europe until we know exactly what is necessary to meet the demands on the European economy for defense production.

I recognize that we cannot cut off all economic assistance to Europe pending the development of a comprehensive defense program for that area. There are certain essential supplies which must flow continuously if hardship is to be avoided and, furthermore, we want our friends in Europe to know that we are still behind them and will do our best for them in spite of the new obligations which confront us. Nevertheless, I feel strongly that if we continue certain types of ECA expenditures, particularly for expansion and development, on the old basis we will find ourselves in a position a year from now when we will wish that certain funds and certain materials had not been committed, that we were free to inaugurate certain projects essential to the defense program not previously foreseen, and that we had held our fire until our target was much more clearly in view.

In the case of Austria specifically, I am convinced that we should continue to assist the Austrian people and we should give them tangible evidence of our continued backing. We should do what is necessary to combat unemployment and to prevent popular unrest. I cannot believe that the erection of a pulp mill to be completed in 2 years is essential to attain these relatively short-run objectives. We could spend our money for more spectacular projects employing larger numbers of people. Before we undertake to construct a pulp mill to accomplish longer range objectives than those I have outlined, we should have a complete reorientation of our long-range industrial plans for Austria, taking into account our own defense program.

I am sending copies of this to Mr. Hoffman, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of Defense for their information.

I would appreciate getting your views on this matter.

Sincerely,

PAT MCCARRAN,
Chairman.

ECONOMIC COOPERATION ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., October 3, 1950.

Hon. PAT MCCARRAN,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCARRAN: This is in further reference to your letter to Mr. Harriman of September 12, 1950, copy of which you were kind enough to send to us, and my letter of September 18, 1950, in which I promised you a more detailed reply to the questions raised therein.

During this summer ECA, like other agencies in Washington, has been thoroughly reexamining the basic policies and procedures guiding the European recovery program in an effort to put its resources fully behind the defense effort without sacrificing the basic objectives of European recovery. Under the auspices of the National Security Council, the FMACC and numerous less formal working arrangements ECA has participated with the Departments of Defense and State in formulating plans for the defense of Western Europe and southeast Asia, and more specifically in the current proceedings under the North Atlantic Pact, and has at the same time received the active cooperation and necessary guidance of the defense agencies in the revision and implementation of our basic policies and procedures.

The consensus is that the military strength of Western Europe must rest on a firm economic foundation strong enough to support a high level of defense expenditures by the Europeans during the next few years and probably for many years to come. To implement such a defense program, a continuing increase in the productive capacity of the western European countries is necessary, and this growth should, if possible, be accelerated. As bitter experience has shown us, however, the physical means of defense are of little use if popular morale is low. Consequently, we cannot permit the increased defense expenditures in Western Europe to cause large inroads on standards of living for any long period of time; the people of Western Europe must not be deprived of the hope that by building up their economy they will some day find an end to their period of austerity.

With regard to the specific issue of the investment program for Austria raised in your letter, ECA has two primary objectives: First, we have to supply the food and raw materials which are required for Austria's immediate needs and which it is unable to buy itself, while at the same time helping Austria to combat its unemployment to prevent popular unrest. Secondly, as a longer-range objective, Austria, which now depends to a large extent for its needed imports upon the generosity not only of the American taxpayer but also of its European neighbors in the west, must strengthen its export potential. ECA therefore is helping Austria to develop those products which other countries wish to buy from it in order to enable it to balance its trials with Western Europe as well as with the Western Hemisphere. Without basic investment in export industries Austria would have no hope but to remain the pensioner of the west. Stop-gap measures, even if they were spectacular, would probably not prevent public opinion from falling easy prey to Communist propaganda. It might also be pointed out that the present crisis will in all probability be with us for many years; it would, therefore, be less costly to us and involve a smaller drain on the resources of Austria's western neighbors if some of our aid were used to build up Austria's investments in her export industries rather than merely financing her current food and raw-material needs.

In appraising the defense potential of Western Europe, Austria's special position has always been recognized. About half of the country is administered by the Soviet Union and the other half is vulnerable to active Soviet aggression. Consequently, there is little point in developing the direct military potential of Austria. From the very beginning of the ERP program, no Austrian industry whose products could be used directly for military purposes has received any ERP assistance. The Vienna screening committee of the United States Government has carefully reviewed all requests for procurement of goods and equipment which might be useful to the Soviet military machine. The Defense Department has had equal representation with the Department of State and ECA on this committee.

Investment in Austrian pulp, paper, and related timber projects has been considered as a most desirable means for implementing ECA policy in Austria. Their products which traditionally have been large export items could not be important to the Russian munitions requirements. By the investment of about $5,000,000, Austria should be able to improve its balance of payments by the equivalent of about $20,000,000 a year or about 10 percent. Not only will this reduce the burden upon the American taxpayer but it will also decrease the drain of scarce resources from other participating countries, resources which these countries sorely need in the years to come. Further, ECA's participation in these projects does not involve the procurement of American goods currently in short supply. If these goods should become scarce because of our own defense effort before the completion of these projects, we would, of course, reconsider our decision.

I trust that these comments satisfactorily answer the questions raised in your letter.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM C. FOSTER,
Administrator.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I wish to commend the Senator from Nevada for his remarks. I have listened to them with deep interest, and, with his permission, I wish to associate myself with the sentiments which he has expressed.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I am grateful to the able Senator from Arkansas.

STATEMENT OF INCOME BY MEMBERS OF CERTAIN LEGISLATIVE, JUDICIAL, AND EXECUTIVE BRANCHES OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill which is identical with a bill I have introduced in the two preceding Congresses. I have not thus far been able to get a hearing on it, but I am one who believes in persevering. It is a bill which provides that each Member of the Senate shall file at the beginning of each year, for a public record, all sources of his income for the preceding year and the amounts thereof.

As I have said in the past, and as I repeat today, I happen to believe that if one wishes to seek and hold public office, such as a seat in the Senate of the United States, his financial life should be an open book. I think the public is entitled to know the sources and the amounts of his income, so that the public can be the judge of whether or not there exists any relationship between the voting record of a Senator and the sources and the amounts of his income. I believe that if one does not have anything to conceal with respect to a possible relationship between his voting record in the Senate and the sources and the amount of his income, he should certainly have no objection to the bill which the junior Senator from Oregon once again introduces. He hopes that in this session of Congress he will at least get a hearing before an appropriate committee of the Senate. I assure my colleagues that if they want to meet me in debate on a referendum vote across the country as to the soundness of my bill, I shall be very happy to accommodate them, and I know that I will give them a good licking. I say that because I am satisfied that the overwhelming majority of the American people would put their stamp of approval on the bill which I have once again introduced. I am satisfied that the overwhelming public opinion is that there should be a full disclosure of the sources and amount of income of any Member of the Senate.

The bill (S. 561) to require certain members of the legislative, judicial, and executive branches of the Government to file statements relating to amount and sources of income, and dealings in securities and commodities, introduced by Mr. MORSE, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

AMENDMENT OF RULE RELATING TO CLOTURE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], I now submit a resolution to amend the so-called cloture rule of the Senate. I am very realistic about these matters. I ask that the resolution again be considered by the appropriate committee. Perhaps in this instance the resolution would go to the Committee on Rules and Administration. However, I shall accommodate myself to whatever reference is made of it.

It is a resolution which concerns itself with the cloture problem of the Senate. It is a resolution which is aimed at the great need, as the junior Senator from Oregon and the junior Senator from Minnesota see it—and I speak most respectfully of the differences of opinion on this subject—for the establishment of the principle of majority rule in the Senate of the United States.

With democratic ideals and principles at stake all over the world, I believe we had best proceed more rapidly than we are proceeding in America to practice such principles and ideals at home. I would have the American people keep in mind the fact that the procedures in the Senate have a very direct bearing upon and relationship to their substantive rights in this body. I happen to be one who believes that the putting into practice of the great civil rights guaranties of our system of government, as I see those rights, will forever be stymied until the procedures of the Senate are changed.

Again I want to say that I wish to be very realistic about these matters. I happen to be one who does not believe that there is a very good chance of passing very much needed civil rights legislation in the Senate so long as we have in the Senate the rule which requires that 64 Senators vote affirmatively on the question of limiting debate in the Senate. In my opinion, it is an undemocratic rule. It is not in keeping with the spirit of our democracy, which I think is bottomed primarily on the principle of majority rule.

My resolution has been discussed at great length on the floor of the Senate, and I do not intend to take a great deal of time discussing it further today, Mr. President, other than to point out that minorities would be adequately safeguarded under my resolution, in that its provisions continue the requirement that 16 signatures would be required for filing a cloture petition.

Furthermore, it guarantees what I believe any fair-minded person must agree is reasonable and adequate debate after the filing of a cloture petition. In addition, it would continue the principle, which was also contained in the resolution I submitted last year, of providing for the farming out of time after a cloture petition has been filed.

It must be taken for granted, I believe—and I consider the historical cases in the Senate to sustain me on this point—that under the provisions of this resolution a cloture petition would not be filed until it was clearly demonstrated that a filibuster had started in the Senate. With the additional provision in the resolution which would make it possible to debate an issue for 1 week after the filing of the petition, I say most frankly that, in my judgment, there is not much to the argument that the resolution would jeopardize any minority rights.

It is true that the adoption of my resolution would put to an end the control of the floor of the Senate by a minority of the Senate. That is true. Of course, I also admit that it is impossible to reconcile the provisions of my resolution with the Calhoun theory of ambassadorship in the Senate. My resolution does not agree with the philosophy of Calhoun, which I think was pretty well put to rest by the War Between the States. The Calhoun theory was that a man sits in the Senate as an ambassador from his State for his State. On the contrary, my resolution is based upon what I think is a much more sound principle of representation. It is the principle that Senators sit here from their States for the Nation, which is quite a different concept of representation. It is based on the principle of majority rule. It is also based on the sound principle that, after all, in the long run what is best for the Nation is best for each State within the Nation. In any event, it is not in keeping with democratic processes to have a rule which permits a Senator or a small group of Senators to block the will of the majority through a filibuster.

Let me hasten to say, as some will say if I do not say it, that the junior Senator from Oregon has been known to filibuster on the floor of the Senate, under existing rules. But that does not make it right. That does not make it a sound procedure. But whenever I have spoken at length—and I spoke at great length only once, Mr. President, for some 10 hours on the floor of the Senate—it was to protect another rule, namely, the unanimous-consent rule, which was being violated by a Senate steam roller on that day, the operators of which would not permit those of us who wanted a postponement of a vote for a period of time not in excess of the period we would be entitled to if the then existing cloture rule were applied, to have such postponement.

I recognize how difficult it is to get the general public to understand these procedural distinctions, but the record is perfectly clear as to the position the junior Senator from Oregon took. I have never filibustered, and I have no intention of ever filibustering in the Senate of the United States to prevent a vote on an issue taking place within a reasonable period of time. The one time I spoke at great length I sought only to have the postponement of a vote from Friday until Monday, which, of course, under the then existing cloture rule, we would have been entitled to, had the Senate been willing to respect its own unanimous-consent rule, which on that day it trampled under foot.

Those of us who held out against that kind of treatment finally caused the majority of the Senate to recognize an unsound policy on their part, and they then yielded to our request for a postponement of the vote until Monday.

Having said that about my record, I should like to say a word further about the filibuster. I believe that in times of great national emergency it is exceedingly dangerous and unwise to have a rule in the Senate which permits a small minority to tie this body up in a filibuster, making it necessary either to break the filibuster by all the physical effort required—and we all know how difficult it is to obtain a consensus of opinion to pursue that course of action—or yield to the minority, or agree to some unwise compromise with the minority in order to clear the floor of the Senate for business on the issues which represent the people's business.

So, Mr. President, I hope that on the basis of the experience we have had with the filibuster in recent years, and on the basis of the experience we have had with the 64-vote rule requirement, the Senate will give favorable consideration to the resolution which the Senator from Minnesota and the junior Senator from Oregon submit at this time, which goes back to the principle for which we have fought in the past, the principle of majority-vote rule in the handling of cloture problems in the United States Senate.

I submit the resolution for appropriate reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 41) submitted by Mr. MORSE, for himself and Mr. HUMPHREY, was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That subsection 2 of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, relating to cloture, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"If at any time, notwithstanding the provisions of rule III or rule VI or any other rule of the Senate, a motion, signed by 16 Senators, to bring to a close the debate upon any measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, is presented to the Senate, the Presiding Officer shall at once state the motion to the Senate, and 1 hour after the Senate meets on the following calendar day but one he shall lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the Secretary call the roll, and, upon the ascertainment that a quorum is present, the Presiding Officer shall, without debate, submit to the Senate by a yea-and-nay vote the question:

"'Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?'

"And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by a majority vote of those voting, then said measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, shall be the unfinished business to the exclusion of all other business until disposed of.

"Thereafter no Senator shall be entitled to speak in all more than 1 hour on the measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, the amendments thereto, and motions affecting the same; except that any Senator may yield to any other Senator all or any part of the aggregate period of time which he is entitled to speak; and the Senator to whom he so yields may speak for the time so yielded in addition to any period of time which he is entitled to speak in his own right. It shall be the duty of the Presiding Officer to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. Except by unanimous consent, no amendment shall be in order after the vote to bring the debate to a close, unless the same has been presented and read prior to that time. No dilatory motion, or dilatory amendment, or amendment not germane shall be in order. Points of order, including questions of relevancy, and appeals from the decision of the Presiding Officer, shall be decided without debate."

SEC. 2. Subsection 3 of such rule is hereby repealed.

MEMORIAL PLAQUE FOR STATUE OF FORMER SENATOR EDWARD DICKINSON BAKER

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a joint resolution providing for an appropriate plaque to be forged and attached to the statue of a great former Member of this body, one of the early Senators from my State, Col. Edward Dickinson Baker. I introduced a similar joint resolution in the last session of Congress, but because of the great amount of work which the Committee on Rules and Administration had to perform it was not able to reach the joint resolution. However, I have been advised by the committee that it would like to have me reintroduce it so that it may be given early consideration I thank the committee for that courtesy. I am very happy to reintroduce the joint resolution. I think it is one which speaks for itself on its merits, and one which ought to be passed at an early date.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 21) to provide for placing a suitable plaque on the base of the statue of Edward Dickinson Baker in the rotunda of the Capitol, introduced by Mr. MORSE, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

AWARD TO DR. STEPHEN K. BAILEY FOR BOOK ENTITLED "CONGRESS MAKES A LAW: THE STORY BEHIND THE EMPLOYMENT ACT OF 1946"

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to take a minute or two to make a brief comment upon a book which I think is deserving of commendation.

For many years the Woodrow Wilson Foundation has been giving an annual award to the best publication in the field of government and democracy.

The award for 1950 has recently been presented to Dr. Stephen K. Bailey for a book entitled "Congress Makes a Law: The Story Behind the Employment Act of 1946." It is such an excellent account of the legislative process as it is practiced that it is worthy of these favorable comments which I make with respect to it on the floor of the Senate today.

The reasons why Dr. Bailey's book was chosen were well stated in the citation that was made by Prof. Charles Fairman, of Stanford University, at the Political Science Association convention here in Washington, D. C., on Thursday, December 28, 1950. As the citation suggests, Dr. Bailey's book is a fascinating combination of political analysis and good literature.

I rise to mention this book, however, not to pay any further tributes to its author, but to point out to the Members of this body that the award to Dr. Bailey is in a very meaningful sense a tribute to one of our most distinguished colleagues. I am referring, of course, to the very distinguished senior Senator from Montana, who contributed more than any other single person to the development of the Employment Act of 1946, whose "spark of will," to use one of Bailey's phrases, "transformed an idea into a specific legislative proposal" whose youthful energy, unflagging courage, and warm personality have endeared him to even those who may not agree with his ideas.

Too often, after a bill has been enacted into law, the great contributions made by its congressional sponsors are forgotten. Too often, Members of Congress labor long and tirelessly on weighty matters of state and not until they have passed from the scene is their stature appreciated—even by their closest colleagues.

It is, therefore, a source of deep gratification to me that Dr. Bailey's book has been paid such a signal compliment, for through it and the attention it will receive more and more people will come to understand the great contribution to the work of this body and the future of this country that has been made by the senior Senator from Montana.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have Professor Fairman's citation of Dr. Bailey's book, to which I referred earlier, printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the citation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CITATION THAT WENT WITH THE WOODROW WILSON FOUNDATION AWARD WHICH WAS PRESENTED TO DR. STEPHEN BAILEY THURSDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1950, AT THE POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION CONVENTION

The citation was read by Charles Fairman, Stanford University.

"The Woodrow Wilson Foundation Award of 1950 for the best publication in the field of government and democracy is made to Dr. Stephen Kemp Bailey for his book entitled 'Congress Makes a Law: The Story Behind the Employment Act of 1946.' Columbia University Press is the publisher.

"Mr. Bailey chose a significant task of manageable proportions, and executed it with imagination and entire adequacy. Lawmaking in the midst of concerted efforts to convince and even covertly to impose upon the human mind is a major aspect of our democracy. The quest for security in employment at useful work reflects a universal aspiration that taxes the present capacity of free government. The Employment Act of 1946 is notable as a datum point in this current democratic movement. Mr. Bailey has traced the impulses that promoted and shaped this legislation—carefully, wisely, luminously. His work discloses initiative and persistence in the pursuit of his inquiry, and measur- 1 judgment in the formulation of conclusions. There is a freshness in presentation and a tidiness in execution that are particularly worthy of emulation.

"The book falls within the Wilsonian tradition. This congeniality is suggested by the fact that at the head of each chapter Mr. Bailey has set a pertinent quotation from Wilson's Congressional Government. As with Wilson, the author would 'make self-government among us a straightforward thing of simple method, single, unstinted power, and clear responsibility.' It is evident that Mr. Bailey took pains in organizing his account, in penning tight sentences and coherent paragraphs, in revising until clear thought found expression in efficient language. Even by Woodrow Wilson's severe standard, this essay is sound politics and good literature."

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I appreciate the opportunity to take advantage of a lull in the Senate proceedings to take care of matters which have accumulated on my desk for quite some time.

RECESS TO MONDAY

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, January 22, 1951, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 17 (legislative day of January 8), 1951:

COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE

Calvin E. Wright, of Rupert, Idaho, to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Idaho, to fill an existing vacancy.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS

V. Allan Hubbard, of Chaffee, Mo., to be collector of customs for customs collection district No. 45, with headquarters at St. Louis, Mo., to fill an existing vacancy.

Mr. Hubbard is now serving under temporary commission issued during the recess of the Senate.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JANUARY 19, 1951

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the one abiding certainty in the midst of all the mutations of time and the only ultimate source of our confidence as we face perplexing circumstances, Thou knowest how often fear and doubt rob us of peace and make us apprehensive of the future.

Grant that our baffled minds and fear-strickened hearts may be inspired with the cardinal virtues of faith and hope as we wait upon Thee and continue faithfully and heroically to champion the cause of righteousness and justice.

We pray that our devotion and moral courage may be kindled and strengthened with a clear vision of that blessed time when, through our trust in Thee and our own best endeavors, we shall achieve life's noblest goals of peace and good will.

May the day soon dawn when the selfish ambitions, which enslave the souls of men and nations, shall be forever supplanted by the Christlike and magnanimous spirit of brotherhood and friendship.

Hear us in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, January 17, 1951, was read and approved.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. DEANE asked and was given permission to address the House for 20 minutes today, following the special orders heretofore entered.

Mr. HARVEY asked and was given permission to use today the special order granted to him for yesterday, following the other special orders.

PRICE CONTROL

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the present inflationary picture is a sorry one indeed. The efforts of the Economic Stabilization Administration to handle and to cope with inflation and price gouging have been very weak and ineffectual. It has been in operation 3 months—3 months marked by timidity, confusion, muddled words, and frenzied inaction.

Run-away prices have been a national scandal since June 25, 1950. At that time, I advocated a wage and price freeze across the board, but was unable to get any action. The Congress, the administration, and the officials selected to supervise the Defense Production Act of 1950 have all fallen down on the job to control inflation.

Mike Di Salle, Price Director, was reported last week to have been ready to impose a 30-day price-wage freeze, but Mr. Alan Valentine, Director of Economic Stabilization Administration, said, "We have come to the conclusion that we do not plan any present across-the-board freeze of prices." What does he mean and who is he trying to help—or to shield? Certainly not the people of this country who are being harassed by the constant increases in everything they have to buy.

Mr. Speaker, the ineptitude of the ESA is such that it should either be abandoned or a new and strong group of officials named to administer the program. How are you going to collect taxes if this inflationary spiral keeps up, and how are you going to impose new taxes if inflation continues?

This is no time for voluntary price controls or vague talk. I urge, Mr. Speaker, that an over-all price-profit-wage control be imposed before another week of profiteering passes by. The people are demanding action and have been since June 25, 1950. The price scandal means cruel and inhuman punishment for thousands of our citizens and imperils our defense effort. The period of inaction in the price-control field has created confusion, bitterness, and frustration.

Big business can—and has—increased prices; organized labor can—and will—demand wage increases; the farmer is protected by support prices; but the great middle group—people living on servicemen's allowances—unorganized white-collar workers—school teachers, State, county, and municipal employees—older persons living on pensions and annuities—all are having trouble making their savings stretch and warding off inflation. Furthermore, redemption of E bonds for the past 9 months have exceeded sales which indicates that people are being forced to spend beyond their incomes and that inflation is our No. 1 and most serious domestic problem.

The times call for equality of sacrifice in the payment of taxes, the granting by Congress to the Department of Agriculture the right to sell stored commodities to force down prices and the imposition of direct controls and price ceilings to keep down prices to stop inflation.

We need:

First. A real excess-profits tax of 100 percent above normal peacetime profits—average profits run 51 percent over last year and some corporations' profits as high as 286 percent.

Second. Elimination of existing tax loopholes so that our economy can be placed on a pay-as-you-go basis.

Third. A roll-back on prices to halt inflation.

Fourth. Legislation to end commodity market speculative profiteering.

Fifth. A halt to nonessential Government expenditures.

The picture of inflation is a very dangerous one. The need for drastic action is now and I urge that we enact legislation to roll back prices to October 1, 1950, although I would personally prefer to have the date set at June 25, 1950. The people want action and they are looking to this Congress for leadership and results in the fight against inflation.

GOVERNOR BYRNES, OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, January 16, accompanied by many distinguished Members of Congress, representing both Houses, I attended the inaugural ceremonies of South Carolina's seventy-eighth Governor—one of my constituents—James F. Byrnes. Assembled in Columbia was the largest crowd of people ever to witness such an event in our State. As the Representative in Congress of our State's most distinguished first citizen, I rise to express our deep gratitude for the honored presence of so many representatives of the Federal and State Governments. During the crisp noon hour thousands of eager people listened to the words of our esteemed fellow citizen to whom has come more public honors than any other South Carolinian. This great statesman, who enjoys the confidence of the vast majority of our people, spoke not only as the new chief magistrate of our Commonwealth but as a world statesman. Those who expected bitter words of criticism were disappointed. In clear, understandable language, he issued a clarion call to all Americans to rally to the support of our great Nation during these, the most trying hours of history.

Thus, in presenting our new Governor, South Carolina again joins hands with her sister States in pledging her all to the end that our free way of life may be continued, and that other sons, regardless as to circumstances, through work and prayer, may achieve the highest distinctions within the gift of our people. I am sure the people of South Carolina will give Governor Byrnes their wholehearted support as he discharges his duties in the office of chief executive of our State.

WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Ways and Means may have until midnight Saturday, January 20, to file a report on the bill H. R. 1724, and that if anyone desires to file a minority report on that bill he may have the same privilege.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

CHARLES E. WILSON

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, I hope every citizen heard, or has the opportunity to read, the speech made by Mr. Charles E. Wilson, our Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization, in Philadelphia on January 17.

The speech had a logical and confident tone. Without minimizing our difficulties and the dangers of our situation, the speaker emphasized factually our full capability to meet and discharge, without fear or confusion, the duties that have devolved upon this generation of Americans. The approach of the speaker was that of a man who is working diligently to reduce our complex problems to manageable proportions, and to solve them.

In the process of actively doing and seeing what can be done, Mr. Wilson obviously suffers none of the frustrations which afflict so many who seem able to do little more than to daily lament our weaknesses in an ignoble spirit of defeatism. We need more confident, lucid explanations like that of Mr. Wilson, and we owe him our thanks for his splendid talk, and also for the service he is performing for the Nation.

I join with him in believing that our best hope for peace is through full mobilization of our power and that to accomplish this mandatory controls will be required. I am sure most people will be glad to know that any doubts within the ODM relative to the need for legal controls have apparently been resolved. We all dislike controls, but rapid price increases have made them necessary.

ENLISTMENT OF GERMAN AND JAPANESE NATIONALS IN THE UNITED STATES ARMY

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, I take this time in the hope that I may clear up certain misunderstandings which seem to have arisen in regard to legislation I have proposed, authorizing the enlistment of German and Japanese nationals in the Armed Forces of the United States. Some Members have stated that they understand that my bill would mean the establishment of a German army under a German chief of staff, and subject to German political control, and a similar Japanese army under Japanese command. This is not the intention of the bill. In fact, I have specifically provided against any outside or foreign control. The bill proposes that we deal directly with the individual in Germany, and in Japan just as we deal with the individual recruit at home. It simply provides for recruiting offices in these countries, not embassies. It proposes no dealing with any foreign government.

My bill would simply allow German nationals and Japanese nationals to enlist as soldiers in the Army of the United States, where they would be directly accountable to their American officers, with absolutely no diplomatic interference.

Mr. Speaker, I also want to call particular attention to the cost of such a program. We have spent approximately a billion dollars in Germany last year in order to give the German people dollar buying power. We have spent hundreds of millions for similar purposes in Japan. These expenditures amount to nothing more than gifts. My bill provides that foreign nationals shall be paid in their own currency. If we were to use the same number of dollars to pay the salaries of German nationals in the United States Army, which we have contributed to the German economy, it would create exactly the same buying power in Germany, and we would be getting something for it, rather than giving our money away. The bill contemplates that we should pay German nationals who serve in our Army, in marks, and pay Japanese in yen. The marks would be purchased from the German Government for dollars, and the yen from the Japanese Government. Each country would still get dollars, and they would be just as good dollars as if we had given them to these people.

I cannot understand why we should object to letting the money we give foreign countries purchase something for us, particularly when it could help us as well as the foreign nation. I cannot understand why some of our diplomats want the United States to always pay and never receive. I cannot understand why some of our military people want American boys to do all the fighting and dying, and object to any program which would even allow foreign nationals to carry part of the load.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. BATTLE asked and was given permission to address the House today for 10 minutes following any special orders heretofore entered.

REREFERENCE OF BILLS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Veterans' Affairs be discharged from further consideration of the bills H. R. 1080 and H. R. 1085, and that they be referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

ROBERT E. LEE AND EDGAR ALLAN POE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, today is one of the outstanding birthdays in America.

January 19 is the birthday of Robert E. Lee, acknowledged by leaders everywhere to be the outstanding commander of the English-speaking race. Teddy Roosevelt said that of him and General Maurice of the British Army, in his recent book on Lee the Soldier, placed him above Wellington as the greatest commander of the English-speaking race.

Today is also the birthday of America's greatest poet, Edgar Allan Poe, who was born on January 19, 1809. The one outstanding American poem in which critics have never been able to find a flaw is Poe's Raven.

I sometimes think of that raven as sitting above the door of the House of Representatives of the American Congress and representing the specter of international inexpediency, which threatens our destruction.

SOCIALISTIC LEGISLATION

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, the three messages recently sent to the Congress by the President are definite proof to me that the freedom of the American people is threatened almost as much at home as from our foes abroad.

The financial solvency of our Nation is our first line of defense, and the first duty of the Congress is to protect it.

In his never-ending call for more spending and higher taxes, in his recent budget request for $71,000,000,000 for the coming fiscal year, President Truman, if the Congress approves, will slug the taxpayers of Illinois alone for $5,376,000,000 as its part in taxes for his hysterical program of tax till it hurts everyone.

Mr. Speaker, his messages again call for the enactment of his political Fair Deal socialistic legislation, including millions of dollars for socialized medicine, the Brannan farm plan, socialized housing, and other similar schemes all of which were rejected and defeated in the recent election.

The people of my State of Illinois, and the Nation as well, will support us Members of Congress who will oppose such unnecessary expenses, and who know that with the cooperation of the President we could and should cut his budget request by over $7,000,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, all Members of Congress will support extraordinary appropriations for preparedness and national defense which is the all-important problem now, but I, and many of my colleagues, shall oppose the President's attempt to incorporate his socialistic schemes in our rearmament program.

FAIR DEAL AS USUAL

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Speaker, on January 17, 1951, the Chicago Daily News published an editorial, entitled "Fair Deal as Usual." It is startling indeed to note the comments about the Fair Deal "hitching a ride on the war machine." If I can judge the temperament of the people today by the expressions contained in the many letters that I am receiving, I venture a guess that a resurrection of the Truman welfare program will meet with decided opposition from within Congress as well as outside of that august body. If the welfare state program is to be resurrected and exploited as a Fair Deal measure, it is indeed an impropitious time to do so when lives and property are being seized in preparation for war. It is apparent that the people are definitely alerted to the dangers of having the socialistic schemes embodied in the welfare program revived and promoted at a time when the resources of the country are being mobilized to fend off the attacks of our enemies both at home and abroad.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including as part of my remarks, the editorial to which I have referred and which is as follows:

FAIR DEAL AS USUAL

The Truman Fair Deal has hitched a ride on the war machine. In his budget message, the President made it clear that while lives and property are being seized in preparation for war, his shopworn socialistic schemes are to be promoted under the guise of aid to mobilization.

The Brannan plan of farm subsidies, for example, is trotted out as a "redirection of the farm program to provide a greater contribution to the defense effort." The idea is to pay farmers from the Treasury the difference between a "fair" price and what they receive for certain commodities. The effect is to transfer to the taxpayers part of the cost of the Nation's food bill.

He wants more social security, more unemployment compensation, more public works, health insurance, more grants to the States, Federal money for schools. He wants more money to finance the white-elephant International Wheat Agreement, and more money for foreign economic aid to "stop communism"—some of it for Tito.

In his state of the Union message, the President advised that the country "must practice rigid economy in its nondefense spending." His budget reveals the insincerity of those words. No wonder that Senator HARRY BYRD, who really believes in economy, terms the proposed budget "the very height of fiscal irresponsibility."

In the projected spending of $71.59 billion, only some $20 billion was accounted for in detail. The rest is subject to military and foreign-aid planning, still too vague to permit estimates of allocations.

There is, for example, no agreement on the size of the Army we are to have. Senator DOUGLAS is advocating Armed Forces of 6,000,000 by the end of the year. The Pentagon has set 3,500,000. But with nobody yet certain what kind of a war we are preparing to fight, the ultimate figure might be anywhere in between.

But for the Voice of America, the overseas information broadcasts that are supposed to be making converts to our side—although with indifferent success, so far—Mr. Truman is quite definite. He wants to triple the appropriation, and spend $166,000,000.

Point 4, the celebrated plan for bringing more prosperity to neglected corners of the earth, is lumped in with other foreign aid. But the Marshall plan is to continue after 1952, and Greco-Turkish aid will go on, all labeled as increasing our ability to resist Russian aggression.

The projected tax bill will be the heaviest in history, higher even than those of wartime. That is necessitated by the necessity to prevent inflation while we spend a proposed $60,000,000,000 on our defense program. It might be noted also that nearly $9,000,000,000 in trust funds, from social-security taxes and the like, will also be spent, but will not be included in the estimates of income.

We are probably to have rationing—and maybe short rations. It is certain that millions of young men will be snatched from their families and careers, and put into uniforms, some for the rest of their lives.

Under these circumstances, it is appalling that the President should have been unwilling to forego a single item in his box of vote lures. Coat them as he may with defense arguments, they remain the political stock by which the Fair Dealers hope to perpetuate themselves in office.

It is Congress which will have to impose priorities on the uses to which taxes shall be put in time of grave national danger. Mr. Truman is as unconcerned about waste as he is about unprecedented taxes. His budget places Congress on notice that the danger is internal, as well as external.

FEDERAL TAXES

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I have a 30-minute special order for Monday, during which time I shall orate on Federal taxes. My theme is going to be, "Where are we going to get the money?" I expect to give a thumbnail sketch of the Federal tax system and point out what we can do and should do and what we cannot do and should not do. After my statement I will invite questions and any challenging of the figures I use.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS AND ADDITIONAL PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include an editorial appearing in the Mobile Press and Register of Mobile, Ala., in commendation of a statement by our distinguished colleague, CLARENCE J. BROWN.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. McCORMACK. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I say to my friend from Massachusetts and the House that, in addition to the program for next week that I announced yesterday, consisting of two bills, if a rule is reported out on the bill (H. R. 1) to authorize the payment by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs of a gratuitous indemnity to survivors of members of the Armed Forces who die in active service, and for other purposes, that will be programed for Wednesday after the armed services bill. I have reserved the right to object to this request simply to make this announcement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

FIRST SUCCESSFUL LANDING AND TAKE-OFF OF AN AIRPLANE FROM THE DECK OF A NAVY SHIP

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include two news articles.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago I had occasion to visit the Navy Building at Eighteenth and Constitution Avenue and there to view a very impressive display commemorating the first successful landing and take-off of an airplane from the deck of a Navy ship 40 years ago yesterday. The display is most interesting and impressive. It includes pictures of the historic event taken at the time and it includes the original motor of the plane and the propeller which was slightly damaged at the take-off when the plane struck the water.

I was especially proud to witness the recognition extended by the Navy to the pilot of that plane. He was Eugene B. Ely, an Iowa farm boy, who was born and raised on a farm just east of Williamsburg in Iowa County, Iowa. He was a test pilot for the Curtiss aircraft firm at the time of the historic flight.

The Washington Daily News of Thursday afternoon, January 18, and the Washington Post of Friday morning, January 19, carried news items announcing the commemoration of this historic event by the Navy and I am including the news articles herewith:

[From the Washington (D. C.) Daily News of January 18, 1951]

NAVY RECOLLECTS AN IOWA FARM BOY STARTED IT ALL

NEW YORK, January 18.—The Navy quietly observed today the fortieth anniversary of a historic event that started a revolution in modern warfare.

On January 18, 1911, an Iowa farm boy named Eugene Ely made a bumpy landing in a Curtiss biplane on a crudely erected platform aboard the armored cruiser U. S. S. Pennsylvania in San Francisco Bay.

Ely's plane was the first to make a successful flight from shore to ship, and for a few hair-raising moments, the daring young pilot thought he would crash.

His flying machine roared toward the 119-foot-long wooden platform at about 60 miles an hour. Ely slowed down to 40 miles per hour as he approached the cruiser.

Three pairs of landing hooks built into his plane missed the first 11 lines which connected sandbags aboard the platform. But the hooks grabbed the next 11 lines and Ely's two-wing machine came to a stop only 30 feet from the ship's stern.

After an hour of hand-shaking with officers and crew members of the Pennsylvania, Ely climbed back into his plane and flew back to the airfield at Tanforan, 10 miles away. Thus he completed the first round trip between shore and ship.

[From the Washington (D. C.) Post of January 19, 1951]

FORTY YEARS AGO, PILOT LANDED ON A SHIP

Forty years ago yesterday, an airplane made history when it made the first successful landing and take-off from the deck of a Navy ship.

Yesterday, the Navy celebrated the day by placing a display of equipment and photographs in the lobby of the Navy Department building at Eighteenth Street and Constitution Avenue NW.

Included in the display are photographs made of the flight and of the pilot, Eugene Ely. Naval aviation began in September 1910 when Capt. W. I. Chambers began a study of aircraft for use with the fleet.

He persuaded Ely, a test pilot for the Curtiss aircraft firm, to find out whether a plane could be launched from the deck of a ship. Ely flew off the U. S. S. Birmingham as it lay moored at Hampton Roads, Va.

Then, on January 18, 1911, Ely landed a plane on a platform aboard the U. S. S. Pennsylvania at San Francisco and took off for a land base. Small boats were placed near the Pennsylvania to aid Ely if anything went wrong with his flight. Sandbags lined the runway, attached to taut lines across the deck, slowing the plane as it landed.

The Navy's display also includes the engine and propeller used in the old Curtiss plane and a series of pictures showing the development of naval aviation through the years.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

[Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

OUR FAR-EASTERN POLICY

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, the UN has a solemn obligation to brand the Chinese Communist regime as aggressors in Korea. Our State Department has finally faced the facts by the introduction of such a resolution. There can be no equivocation on this move, but will that be enough? Obviously no. I strongly urge that the following steps be taken by us and our allies in the Far East. If not, our troops should be evacuated from Korea immediately.

First and foremost we must bomb the Chinese Communist supply bases in China itself. The White House, the Department of State, and some in the Pentagon have for some unknown reason withheld such badly needed aid to our land forces in Korea. How can the Commander in Chief justify a ban against Air Force bombing of vital targets in China proper? With our valiant troops pressed to the breaking point, such a restriction on our Air Force is totally unwarranted.

The following information has recently come to my attention and illustrates how unwise some of our top policy decisions can be. The Chinese Communists have at Mukden the largest and most efficient arsenal in the Far East. Reports indicate that this arsenal now supplies, and has for some time supplied, the Chinese Communist ground troops with practically all of their weapons. One all-out bombing raid by our vastly superior air strength would destroy this arsenal. The benefits to our hard-pressed GI's in Korea would be tremendous. Why will not the President, the State Department, and the Pentagon give General MacArthur the right to strike at the very heart of the Chinese Communist strength? There is no satisfactory answer from the President and his advisers. While the casualty lists steadily mount, our diplomats talk by the hour. Congress and the American public should not tolerate this situation any longer. Give General MacArthur the "go signal" and destroy this arsenal and other Communist supply bases.

In addition to all-out bombing of the Chinese Communist strategic targets such as the Mukden arsenal, the United States Navy and other UN naval units should impose a blockade on the coast of China. The Chinese Nationalist forces under Chiang Kai-shek should be supplied with military equipment and from bases in Formosa should be permitted to attack and invade the Chinese mainland. This "second front" in China is long overdue.

The fallacy of fighting the hordes of Asia on the ground is obvious. We are bleeding ourselves to death, which is just what Stalin wants us to do. It is utter stupidity to continue such a policy when we are not fighting with both fists. For too long a time our State Department has pursued a policy toward the Chinese Communists of "an olive branch in one hand and a half-loaded pistol in the other."

A long overdue show-down is imminent in the United Nations. The fate of the UN may hang in the balance on the vote on this resolution by the United States which seeks to brand Red China as ruthless aggressors. If our alleged allies fail to support the United States in this crucial hour, we should forthwith withdraw from the organization. The facts are clear-cut, and if the members in the UN run out now, any hope for the free world in that organization must be abandoned.

THE CONGRESSIONAL MEDAL OF HONOR

Mr. VAIL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAIL. Mr. Speaker, the Medal of Honor, which is more commonly termed "The Congressional Medal of Honor," was originally authorized by an act of the Congress in 1861, during the Civil War period. This legislation was revised in 1916, to establish the Army and Navy Roll of Honor, and to further provide, upon application, a monthly pension in the sum of $10 to these signally honored veterans for the balance of their natural lives, after they had reached the age of 65 years and were completely separated from the armed services.

The legislation I have introduced in the House today will repeal this statute of 1916, and will provide a special monthly pension for these outstanding veterans in the amount of $250 for the balance their natural lives, payable from the date of their application for admission to the Army, Navy, or the Air Force Roll of Honor.

You will note that my bill provides for the establishment of an Air Force Roll of Honor, as it should be under the unification system of the armed services, and it removes the 65-year-old qualification provision. The bill retains the provision of complete separation from the armed services, thereby withholding payment of this special monthly pension to officers or enlisted men who are drawing regular retirement pay, since veterans in this category are still considered a part of the armed services.

This bill I have introduced is specifically intended to increase the special monthly pension benefits, and to pay such benefits to these veterans during their period of life when they can enjoy them and use them to practical advantage. Such would not be the case after they have reached the age of 65 years, since the majority of these veterans are deceased before that age is reached.

The Medal of Honor is the greatest decoration and highest honor than can be conferred upon members of the armed services, in the name of the people of the United States, through their duly elected representatives in the Congress. It is awarded to these veterans in conjunction with the following citation, "for having in action involving actual conflict with an enemy distinguished himself conspicuously by gallantry or intrepidity, at the risk of his life, above and beyond the call of duty."

Since 1861, some 3,000 of these awards have been made and today there is slightly over 400 of these thusly honored veterans living and registered on the Army and Navy Rolls of Honor. I doubt that we will ever have more than that number on these rolls at one time, in fact it is reasonable to assume that we shall have less since only 531 of these medals were awarded during the World Wars I and II, some of them posthumously. Today their ranks are fast diminishing, particularly those so honored during World War I.

Rather than give the men of these fast fading ranks the paltry sum of $10 monthly, as a practical reward for their gallant and outstanding military service in the defense of this Nation, it would be better to forget them entirely. When these veterans were so signally honored, and the memories of their conspicuous deeds were so fresh in our minds, we eulogized them, publicized and wined and dined them upon their return to their homes, and then promptly forgot them.

It is known that there are current instances of medalists in straitened financial circumstances to whom an allotment of a fair and reasonable pension could represent freedom from want, an objective to which the Nation should stand committed.

I, for one, believe the time has come for correction of our thoughtlessness. I do not believe the rank and file of the American people ever intended or believed that these veterans should have been forgotten in a practical sense.

I have, therefore, introduced this bill in the House today to insure economic security to these gallant men and hope and believe that I shall have the support of the majority of the Members of this Congress in support of the enactment of this legislation.

Surely this is the very least a grateful country can do to evidence its ever-continuing interest in its outstanding war heroes.

I submit the following table showing the total of these awards to date:

Total of awards for the Congressional Medal of Honor

Army:
Total awards since 1863	2,119
Awards prior to World War I	1,723
Awards during World Wars I and II	396
Navy:
Total awards since 1863	916
Awards during World Wars I and II	629
Awards during World Wars I and II	78

Marine Corps:
Total awards since 1863	193
Awards prior to World War I	98
Awards during World Wars I and II	86
Coast Guard: Total of awards since 1863	1

NOTE.—The Army records include the Army Air Force during World Wars I and II.

Available statistics from the Army and Navy Departments indicate that approximately 400 recipients of these awards are still living.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. POWELL (at the request of Mr. MANSFIELD) was given permission to address the House for 30 minutes on Tuesday next, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan asked and was given permission to address the House on Tuesday and Thursday next for 10 minutes, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PRESTON] is recognized for 15 minutes.

THE UNITED NATIONS

Mr. PRESTON. Mr. Speaker, not since the birth of this Nation have its people experienced such a feeling of frustration and uncertainty as seems to be in evidence everywhere today. The fight for our independence was an inspired struggle sustained by a burning ambition and love for freedom. The great civil conflict in which passion met passion brought forth cohesion and greater love of country. Then two great world wars were determined by the might and patriotic action of our people who charted a course and set sail with a confidence and sureness which must attend ultimate victory.

These same Americans, all a part of this generation, who have made possible these last two victories, and who so earnestly hoped for an era of peace and understanding between nations, now find themselves involved in a political and military quagmire from which there seems to be no release obtainable. Hence the predominant feeling of frustration.

It is more than passing strange that this feeling should be abroad in America—a country well known and famous for its unstinted support of its fighting men wherever they have been committed. From some quarters doubt is expressed about the sureness of the leadership of our Nation. Others would blame our Military Establishment, while Congress comes in for its share of the criticism. But, Mr. Speaker, I have my own ideas about the underlying cause for this strange and almost unbecoming attitude of the American people. I lay it directly at the door of a timid and vacillating United Nations organization. What was once hoped to be a great forum for world peace seems to have turned into a great arena where the most vicious international politics are being played at the expense of American blood and prestige. While the United States awaits the pleasure of the UN to act on the all-important question of declaring Red China the aggressor in Korea, our troops continue to bear the brunt of overpowering attacks by the Red hordes. The American people have been patient and Congress has been more than patient, hoping that the UN would meet its responsibility in a forthright and courageous manner. It is obvious now that good faith on the part of some of our allies in the UN is sorely lacking, and that these timid nations are plunging a dagger into the heart of the UN. That it is dying of its own nonfeasance is tragically true. The failure of the UN to declare the Red Chinese as aggressors has had a far-reaching effect throughout the world. It has not only hurt American prestige, but it has shaken world faith in the integrity of the UN. It has also revealed to Russia a weakness in the UN which is gratifying to them, to say the least. What are our fighting men and those from other nations in Korea saying about this weak-kneed attitude in the UN? Does this tend to stimulate their will to endure the frigid conditions of Korea while they fight an almost hopeless holding war?

While our delegates to the UN have demanded action, I doubt that they have employed language and unveiled threats of sufficient consequence to jolt the UN into action.

As one who has steadfastly supported the United Nations, I have reached the point in my thinking where I am ready to issue an ultimatum to the UN saying without reservation that you either proceed forthwith to brand Red China as an aggressor, or the United States will withdraw from the UN.

This may seem to be a harsh declaration, but timid approaches to this question have failed. It may be said by some that our withdrawal would result in the death of the UN, and perhaps it will, but its collapse is assured anyway if it continues to play politics with this China question. China is in the role of a traitor in her aggression in Korea. China has become an international ingrate in her sell-out to Russia. Whatever her good reasons for civil revolt may have been, there is nothing to justify her attack on the United States in Korea. Our Nation has been a benefactor to China's people and for the UN to refuse to take cognizance of these facts renders it unfit as a forum to determine international problems.

Great Britain has certainly contributed nothing toward securing favorable action in the UN on the China question. She again weighs her position in international trade against loyalty to her one dependable ally in the world. Britain's fear of Russian aggression toward the west has dimmed her view of the tragic situation in the Far East. Britain's and America's interest are inseparable and it ill becomes Britain to drag her feet in the UN while we suffer for her failures.

Although I firmly believe that the ultimate showdown between communism and democracy will come in Western Europe and we, as a nation, must contribute a large share toward Western European defenses, we cannot in good conscience write off Asia to communism. Should the Reds drive the UN forces out of Korea, we could expect them to continue their drive until Japan was completely conquered. The Philippines would be next in their march of aggression.

It has been suggested that we have only two alternatives in Korea—one to make all-out war, and the other to get out. This seems to be true at this time. It is quite clear that China will not settle this issue except on her own terms—terms utterly reprehensible to us. First of all, they would have us withdraw all UN troops, thus putting South Korea in the same danger she was on June 25, 1950. How ironic this would be when we pause to consider our dead and wounded, as well as the total havoc and destruction of the cities and villages of South Korea.

The pages of American history will never become too yellowed with age as to blot out the record of our cowardice if we bow down to those heathen Reds or leave Korea anyway except by force. America is a sleeping giant today while her sons glorify themselves in combat under the most adverse conditions ever known to American fighting men. There is no place for defeatism in our far-eastern effort. This conflict is but a forerunner to others of greater intensity. China should be warned by the United States that unles she shows a willingness to truly compromise the issues involved that the weight of our power—full force—and that of Chiang will be released against her. We are shackled now by the United Nations in a fashion heretofore unknown to this Government. It has placed us at a disadvantage from a military standpoint. Too much reliance has been placed in the UN by the people, and especially by our national leaders, for a diplomatic settlement of this conflict. Too many of us have expected the UN to come up with a magic formula to suddenly halt the war in Korea. What has been the net result? Nothing more than a dangerous cease-fire order which would ultimately mean, if accepted by the Reds, sacrificing Formosa to the Chinese and admitting Red China to the UN.

Congress has a very special responsibility in this grave crisis. As the sounding board of American sentiment it should give some expression of its views to the executive department and to those representing us in the United Nations. I believe strongly that Congress should give prior approval to the commitment of troops in foreign soil and I am convinced that the entire Asiatic situation should be debated to the end that a more positive and definite policy may be established. Is there anyone today who can accurately say what our aims are in Asia? How long are we going to fight China with one hand tied? Are we going to defend Japan if routed out of Korea? Are we going to utilize the army of Chiang? Are we going to wait another 12 months to arm Japan? These are the questions deserving an early answer. It will be too late if we defer positive decisions much longer. Our vitality is being sapped by this freakish war, while our prestige in the world sinks lower and lower. To those who say that the answer is to withdraw from Korea, I would reply that to haul down the flag of our country is an insult to our traditions. Let it be shot down if it must, but hauled down, never.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRESTON. I yield.

Mr. COX. The gentleman, in my opinion, has rendered a very important patriotic service in making vocal the smoldering wrath of the American people.

Mr. PRESTON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRESTON. I yield.

Mr. GATHINGS. The gentleman has made a most courageous speech for which I commend him heartily. I just placed in the RECORD an editorial from the Memphis Press-Scimitar which I commend to the reading of all Members.

Mr. PRESTON. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRESTON. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I also commend the gentleman on a very fine speech. He has given a true picture of the current international situation. I join with the gentleman in expressing the hope that the United States will withdraw its allegiance from the United Nations and reaffirm its allegiance to the United States.

Mr. PRESTON. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALBERT). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCVEY] is recognized for 10 minutes.

OUR FOREIGN ENTANGLEMENTS

Mr. MCVEY. Mr. Speaker, the gravity of world events and uncertainties in our domestic economy make it incumbent upon us to reexamine our international policies, from time to time. They should be studied in an effort to determine whether our objectives, for which we have given so much blood and treasure, have been achieved.

We entered World War I with the slogan "to make the world safe for democracy," and now there is less democracy in the world than has been seen for generations. We fought a second war to rid us of the menace of dictatorship, only to find a decided increase in the number of dictators, and one at least more menacing than before. In the attainment of these two primary objectives we have failed miserably.

A third objective is founded upon the belief that if we pour our billions into England, France, and the Low Countries, we shall find them standing by us as allies in a third world war. The failure of this objective will bring us the greatest disillusionment and the most humiliating disappointment of all. If anyone believes that England and France, for example, will stand by our side in a third world war, he is indulging in wishful thinking.

The governments in those countries are much more in tune today with Russia than they are with our free-enterprise system. For confirmation, we have only to look at England with a former Communist as War Minister, and France with one-third of her Parliament claiming membership in the Communist Party. The Communist Party in France is now the largest single influence in that republic. It is larger than any other political party. The armies of France were paralyzed at the start of World War II by turmoil in the government—there is no reason to expect more favorable conditions should we engage in a third world war.

Anyone who understands the Governments of England and France as they exist today, and who believes that those countries will lay their cities open to the attack of atomic or hydrogen bombs by Russia, is just not facing situations realistically. Their attitude toward and their lack of cooperation in the Korean conflict give rise to the belief that their policies will be to drift gradually into neutral corners in the hope that when the blows fall they may escape. If America fights a third world war, there is every reason to believe we shall stand alone.

Some of our leaders in government have tried to be great internationalists—a stage of action for which, by previous traditions and experience, they were ill-prepared. During this indulgence in internationalism we have piled up a Federal debt that threatens to undermine our domestic economy; we see the threat of a third world war which if continued for any length of time will break us financially; we see the loss of many liberties at home, and a threat to a free-enterprise system which has furnished us the means whereby we can keep the lifeblood flowing in Britain's Socialist Government.

These things we have achieved under the banner of internationalism, but they were not our stated objectives. In those we have failed notably. I am primarily an educator. I am in politics in the hope that I may serve our Nation's welfare and for no other reason. But I submit to you, if an educator, after setting up a group of objectives and spending huge sums of money, should miss his mark so widely, that educator would be out of a job.

The time has come when we shall have to think seriously of America first of all. If it is true, as many believe, that we cannot expect much help from European nations in the event of conflict with an aggressor, then let us make this country strong enough to fight its battles alone if need be. This will not be the case if we continue to distribute our manpower and our remaining wealth to the four corners of the earth. We had best keep our guns and ammunition at home because there is not complete assurance that those guns will be pointed eastward in the event of a third world war.

Let us try with every means at hand to preserve the peace and prevent another struggle with the calamitous effect that would follow in the wake of modern warfare, but let us not delude ourselves in the thought that other powers will fight those battles for us. That objective will fail as the others have failed. It is my judgment we shall stand alone, and we must build our strength and conserve our wealth, because as a Nation in that struggle, if it comes, our very existence may be at stake. God forbid that it should come, but there are ideologies on the march in the world today which may compel us to take militant issue.

Some men who are prominent in the field of education and in politics support the theory of a world government as a solution to international problems. A world government is a visionary dream that is bereft of practicality. There is no way in which the various concepts of governments can be reconciled. We even have divisions in opinions here at home. The scheme of gathering all of the ideologies of the world under one government is an undertaking beyond the scope of human effort. Russia has the solution for a world federation in which everyone should be a Communist. We certainly do not wish to live in that type of society. On what basis may we assume that all nations would agree to any proposals we might offer for a world government?

Our duty, it seems to me, is clearly laid out. We must begin to think of saving America first of all. We must conserve our resources. We must keep our people not only militarily strong but strong in the faith in our American way of life that has set us apart from other peoples in so many accomplishments. We must be able to cut through the ideologies of the Old World and awaken new hope in the perpetuation of those freedoms which have made it possible for our country to shoulder such a large share of the burdens of the world today.

A Russian leader by the name of Lenin said a quarter of a century ago:

> Russia will not have to fight America because America will spend itself into destruction.

On another occasion he said:

> The easiest way to promote a bloodless revolution is for the currency of a nation to commit suicide.

We must not permit those dreadful prophecies to come true.

Our President has said:

> We shall resist aggression in any part of the world.

I submit to you we have neither the manpower nor the means to shoulder a responsibility of that magnitude. The highways of the world are strewn with the wreckage of nations and empires that have indulged in ambitious programs of this character. If the pages of history are not sufficiently revealing, let us take a lesson from what is happening in Korea today.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McVEY. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I desire to commend the gentleman, this schoolmaster from Illinois, a State of great school masters, on his intelligent and courageous discussion.

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McVEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. VURSELL. I wish to commend the splendid address of my colleague from Illinois. May I ask, buttressing his thought, is it not a fact that England and France have wrecked themselves in two world wars, and we have had to help them get them back on their feet? After having spent $60,000,000,000 in the First World War and $400,000,000,000 in the Second World War, if we continue to try to carry that load on our back is it not beyond peradventure of a doubt that if we go into a third world war we will wreck this country financially and lose our own liberty?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

DECLARING THE CHINESE COMMUNIST AUTHORITIES AN AGGRESSOR IN KOREA

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 77) and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

> Resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that the United Nations should immediately act and declare the Chinese Communist authorities an aggressor in Korea.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I know this resolution will be overwhelmingly adopted by the Members of the House. It is a very short resolution, but one that has been very carefully worked out by responsible Members on both sides. In offering this resolution, I am happy and proud to say, and I want the record to show, that it constitutes the joint action of my colleague, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], and myself, I as majority leader of the House of Representatives, leader of the Democratic Party in this body, to make the record more specific, and my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] as minority leader, leader of the Republican Party in the House.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. STEFAN. Can the gentleman tell the House whether or not a similar resolution has been introduced in the other body?

Mr. McCORMACK. I understand a resolution the substance of which is similar has been introduced in the other body.

Mr. STEFAN. Have similar resolutions been passed by the House of Representatives on other international questions such as this?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am unable to state that now.

Mr. STEFAN. Does this set some kind of precedent?

Mr. McCORMACK. There is no precedent on this, because the United Nations is something of recent origin.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VORYS. Is not the present situation utterly unprecedented in the history of the Republic or the history of civilization?

Mr. McCORMACK. I agree with the gentleman. My friend was asking me if there was a precedent for this. I assume there are precedents involving important matters in the past, but certainly this is an unprecedented time. The resolution is offered under the conditions it is because of the fact this is an unprecedented time.

Mr. STEFAN. Is it not a fact that our delegation to the United Nations have already made such a request of the United Nations, that the United Nations as a whole declare the Chinese Communists aggressors?

Mr. McCORMACK. Exactly. It is my understanding that the request has been made of the General Assembly as distinguished from the Security Council, because in the General Assembly the veto cannot operate, whereas it could operate in the Security Council. My understanding is that this is a matter which is now being debated before the General Assembly of the United Nations.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. When was this resolution introduced—just this morning?

Mr. McCORMACK. The resolution is introduced now.

Mr. GROSS. With no other notice of it?

Mr. McCORMACK. I can assure the gentleman the matter has been very carefully looked into and carefully screened and cleared by responsible members of both parties.

Mr. GROSS. Does the gentleman intend to ask for a roll-call vote on this resolution?

Mr. McCORMACK. I hope there will be no request for a roll-call vote on the resolution. There will be no necessity for that.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. VORYS. I happen to have some knowledge of the background of this resolution.

Mr. McCORMACK. If I may interrupt the gentleman, I want to say that the gentleman has plenty of knowledge about the resolution. I want the record to show that, because the gentleman from Ohio was one of those Members who very kindly and courteously discussed the matter with me. Therefore, I know the gentleman knows a great deal about the history of the resolution.

Mr. VORYS. As I understand, the agreement between the leadership is that the program today should be noncontroversial. I wish to say I can imagine nothing more noncontroversial, and nothing on which there could possibly be less controversy in the House of Representatives and among the American people than the pending resolution. I am sure it will not be necessary to have anything but a voice vote on the resolution, because the action of the House, so far as that is concerned, will be unanimous.

Mr. McCORMACK. I agree with the gentleman because this resolution shows clearly, not only to the country but to the world, the bipartisan unity of sentiment—the unity of sentiment which exists among all of us as Americans—and many people abroad, particularly those in totalitarian dominated countries or their regimes had better not fail to understand and appreciate the significance of the spirit of America.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman, one of the ranking minority members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say I certainly will support the resolution. However, I think it is rather unusual for the resolution to be presented at this time when it was announced there would be no business. I, for one, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, never knew a thing about it. I am wondering if the matter ever was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. McCORMACK. May I state to my friend the reason for bringing it up today is because of the exigency of the moment. I appreciate the fact, of course, that this is an unusual procedure, but this is quite different from the general legislative business which we all want to have referred to the legislative committees. But unusual circumstances call for action today, if we are going to take any action on the resolution at this time.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I believe most of the members of the committee were in town and it would have taken 10 minutes to get together. I think we ought to have known something about it.

Mr. McCORMACK. I cannot challenge the gentleman's statement in all sincerity and honesty; but so far as the gentleman from Massachusetts is concerned, I exhausted all means in my power to ascertain the views of all persons and agencies who might be interested in this, both officially and unofficially, and to see whether or not the necessary screening could be made and clearance obtained for the consideration of the resolution. I can assure my friend that it is only as a result of my feeling that the Members of the House, fully realizing the responsibilities falling upon them as legislators, and particularly the leadership of the gentleman's party, especially with relation to this particular question, would act upon the resolution after it has been screened that I offered the resolution having in mind the importance of the timing. Who can tell what will happen in 48 hours? It was felt that it was very important that this matter be acted upon today. With that I think my friend will not feel disturbed about not having been consulted.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield. I was going to yield time to the gentleman in his own right.

Mr. RICHARDS. I thank the majority leader. Like the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH], I am very jealous of the rights and prerogatives of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House. Ordinarily I would insist that the resolution be referred to our committee. But this is no ordinary occasion. Time is so short, the issue so great, and the necessity for action by this House is so impelling that after talking with the majority leader, the minority leader, and a number of members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I feel that it is in the national interest to pass this resolution today.

The first meeting of the Foreign Affairs Committee has been set for next Tuesday and that may be too late for effective action. I believe every member of the Foreign Affairs Committee agrees with the purport of this resolution. I believe every Member of the House who seriously considers the issue involved will be for it, and I hope that it will be passed unanimously.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. I merely wish to make the observation that the acceptance of this resolution without protest will evidence that on matters affecting the security of the Nation unity is an actuality.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I presume this resolution will be passed, but I do not want it construed, as far as I am individually concerned, as indicating a willingness on my part to turn over to the so-called United Nations the right to declare war for the United States or to tell us where to go and fight whose battles.

Everyone knows that while the so-called United Nations declared this emergency, they have called on the United States to do practically all the fighting, called on our boys to do practically all the suffering and dying, and now the United States will be called upon to pay the bill.

I do not want this action construed as expressing a willingness to send our boys into China to bog down and lose a million more American men. As far as I am concerned, I am for getting out of the United Nations and having American affairs run as the Constitution requires.

I am not for surrendering our prerogatives to any foreign power or group of foreign powers.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Are you going to yield any time to other Members to discuss this matter?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes. I told the gentleman I would yield him time in his own right, and I try to keep my word.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's resolution. I was interested to know whether the gentleman feels the same revulsion that I have for the cease-fire order which would oblige us to consult with Soviet Russia and Red China and the British Government about Formosa and similar matters of that kind.

Mr. McCORMACK. I may say to the gentleman that that is water over the dam now. We know of the action taken by the United Nations General Assembly. We know of the action taken by those in control of the Chinese people on the mainland of Asia. That is water over the dam, so my opinion on it at this time would be more or less irrelevant. This is another issue and another question and another proposition.

Mr. HALE. If the water is over the dam, well and good. I hope it is.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I know that our distinguished majority leader, before introducing this legislation, discussed it thoroughly with the distinguished minority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], with the ranking minority members of the Foreign Affairs Committee the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS], and with the acting chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RICHARDS], as well as other members of the committee.

Mr. McCORMACK. Fortunately I met our friend the gentleman from New Jersey, Dr. EATON, a few minutes ago and showed it to the gentleman. There is a lot of work in connection with it, you can understand, and I can assure you that as far as I am concerned everything was done from my angle to contact the Members who have a responsibility in this House on this question; but, again, these are all matters which come to a head very quickly if they do; they either do or do not.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I am sure every Member of the House recognizes that insofar as this particular resolution is concerned, time is of the essence.

I hope that this action expressing the sense of this great body will be a matter of evidence and will receive the deepest consideration by the representatives of all the countries that comprise the United Nations.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman says that time is of the essence in this matter. I remind him that time is of the essence in a number of matters, including doing something about these abnormal prices.

Mr. McCORMACK. I know, but I wish now to confine myself to this issue.

Mr. GROSS. Yes; I understand. Now I wish to ask the gentleman a question: Is it possible to have this resolution read at this time by the Clerk so that we may know what we are discussing?

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may again be read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

(The Clerk again read the resolution.)

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, at this particular time the United Nations is really on trial. The New York Times carried an editorial this morning headed "UN on trial." I agree with this. This resolution is a matter of paramount importance and it should make a powerful contribution toward the efforts of the representatives of those countries who are members of the United Nations, particularly those representing countries outside of a certain group, in doing the things they should do not only for today but for countless years to come, if the United Nations is to have even the possibility of becoming a powerful instrument internationally for good.

I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] 5 minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to cooperate with my friend, the distinguished majority leader, in support of this resolution. If I had any regret it is that the resolution had not been submitted several weeks ago. Particularly, I wished the resolution could have been submitted befor the so-called appeasement ceasefire vote of several days ago. But be that as it may, the resolution is here, and I hope it is the beginning of a new, of a different course in the Orient than we have followed in the past. Surely the majority leader can be forgiven for not having the bill referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. That apparently would have been impossible under the time-limit needs. I understand the United Nations will vote on Monday. We are therefore justified in taking it up by unanimous consent. And I do hope that it will be a precedent in one way. The people of the United States can speak only through their membership in Congress; and the people of the United States are vitally concerned not only with what goes on in the Orient but in Europe as well. We have had far too little real consultation in the past. Congress has had little if any influence in directing our foreign policy. I am somewhat surprised that the present resolution has come to us and I do hope it is the beginning of a departure from secret diplomacy. I join in this resolution and I hope it will be passed unanimously so that the people of the world will know how the United States feels about Communist China.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Does the gentleman think we can get a resolution through this fast invoking the price and wage controls that we passed last summer?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Massachusetts is not a crystal-ball gazer and cannot answer that question.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I am wondering how much notice the distinguished minority leader had on this proposed resolution?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I may say in all frankness that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS] spoke to me about it yesterday. I told him I was in favor of the resolution. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] just before the legislation was offered today spoke to me and asked me if I was in favor of it. I told him that I would support it.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. It seems to me, then, if some members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House had 24 hours' notice there is no good reason why all of the members of the committee should not have been on notice.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I would not say that is necessarily a fact. When I discussed this subject with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS] yesterday none of us thought it would come up today. It was my belief it would just be considered by the Foreign Affairs Committee. However, I can realize the urgency of the resolution to be acted upon now if it is to have any effect.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. I may say that what the gentleman says in reference to this resolution coming up today is absolutely correct. However, there are so many things to do it is one of those things that comes to a point with suddenness. The gentleman's statement, though, is correct.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Things like this come up unexpectedly and change a legislative program. All understandings are subject to change, should anything out of the ordinary develop, and the gentleman from Massachusetts has proceeded in good faith.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I have no objection to the resolution. It is probably a step that should be taken. But I wonder what the effect will be when word goes out over the country that it was adopted unanimously and only a handful of Members present, and that word will go out. If we want this resolution to have effect, should there not be present here a quorum? I am not asking necessarily for a record vote.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I may say to the gentleman that there is a substantial number about, and if it is adopted unanimously, that would indicate unquestionably that there is little objection to it among the full membership.

Mr. WOOD of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WOOD of Idaho. Is it not a fact that passage of this resolution by the House of Representatives here today practically declares war against Communist China? Is it not tantamount to that? Is it not a fact also it is immaterial to precedence and what Members were notified and who were not, it is a matter that this country in general will consider a declaration of war by this body against Communist China? I shall vote against this resolution.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. What we are going through in Korea is pretty close to that.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SHAFER. I wonder if it would not be well to direct this at Communist Russia rather than China?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Does not the gentleman think the Congress of the United States should have been consulted before the United Nations plunged us into this war or before our troops were sent there without our consent? Does not the gentleman think that the Congress of the United States that is charged by the Constitution with the responsibility of declaring war should be consulted before our troops are sent to foreign countries to fight anybody's war?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I think I made myself clear upon that point. I stated that I hope that this will be a precedent for continued consultation with Congress when all great questions of policy are involved. Congress represents the people.

Mr. RANKIN. I do not want this to go down as a precedent or as an indication that the Congress is surrendering its power to this so-called United Nations, this Towel of Babel in New York.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS].

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, I heartily support this resolution. I regret it comes so late. I can well understand why it needs prompt action. This sort of House action should have been taken before this.

Ten days ago, on January 9, I made a speech on this subject stating that the United Nations, unless it took the action recommended in this resolution on Red Chinese aggressors, was headed for its last roundup. My colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEATING] made a speech the same day to the same effect; my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS] had made a similar speech the day before. A number of Members discussed the advisability of having some sort of resolution, and we contacted the majority leader. We Republicans did not want to have any resolution introduced which would, because of inaction on it, give anybody the idea that the Congress was not interested. Therefore, those who have been interested in this matter did not want a resolution introduced unless we felt fairly certain that it could have support on both sides of the Chamber, and a chance to have it cleared for floor action by the House leadership. I brought up the question of this type of resolution and this sort of action in the Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on the Far East, which was meeting informally in our committee room, and there was some discussion of it there. All members of the committee were invited to that meeting but, as has been already stated, our committee is not yet formally organized for this session.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SHAFER. That is one reason I think we should adjourn right now and get this thing off the board, because the gentleman does not speak for the Republican Party.

Mr. VORYS. That is right. I have not been attempting to speak for the party or for the minority on the committee. I am merely saying that I am familiar with a great deal of consultation on this subject with members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in the room of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, but there was no resolution for the committee to act upon formally. Now, I think the trouble with this resolution is that it was not introduced some time before, so it could have been referred to the Foreign Affairs Committee. But our delegation in the United Nations is pressing for action there, and unless action is taken today by the House, it may well be that our delegation in the United Nations will not have the moral support that might come from this resolution. I am, therefore, willing, reluctantly and regretfully, to have our committee bypassed.

Let me say this in answer to some things that have been said:

The UN, despite its weaknesses, has been at least a symbol for the expression of the collective moral judgments of mankind on international questions. If it fails to say soon and overwhelmingly that Communist China is an aggressor in Korea, it will have failed of its purpose, reduced to its lowest common denominator. What the free world can do about aggression, how to do it, involves questions upon which there can be honest differences of opinion. What civilization can do about crime is always a question, but whenever civilization fails to recognize and denounce crime for fear of the consequences of its own moral judgment, civilization is gone. I do not think that civilization has failed in this crisis. If, however, the United Nations fails to record the moral judgment of civilization by recognizing and denouncing this aggression in Korea, it is headed for its last roundup. I hope that, in this grave crisis, the representatives of the free nations of the world act wisely, rightly, bravely, and soon.

With Red China slaughtering Americans every day, I cannot understand those who fear that this action may provoke them. They seem rather thoroughly provoked now. United action by the United Nations will be more likely to calm them down and sober them up than to provoke them.

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BUSBEY. I would like to ask the distinguished gentleman on the Committee on Foreign Affairs if they have had a full meeting of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. VORYS. No; I do not believe there has been a full meeting of that committee. The chairman of the committee has been ill. However, some of the subcommittees have been meeting, not to consider legislation, but to obtain background material and to discuss informally the various and vexing questions that face us in our international relations.

Mr. BUSBEY. Could not the Committee on Foreign Affairs report this resolution out in 24 hours?

Mr. VORYS. I certainly think they would if they got the chance.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, permit me to assure the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] who has so graciously granted me this 3 minutes that the time was not requested because of any desire to obtain publicity. Permit me also to congratulate the gentleman upon the superb strategy, the outstanding generalship he has shown in presenting this resolution at this time in its present form. Few leaders of a majority party have the ability to obtain from a minority party, which for weeks and months has been vigorously criticizing and condemning a major policy of the majority, an all-out endorsement. Mr. Acheson and Mr. Truman have jacked this country into a position where they can get world war III without a declaration of war by Congress. The gentleman gets an endorsement of that policy by the opposition.

Just how, when, and by what method the Republican leadership was taken into camp is not known to the minority membership. From the debate so far it appears that but one member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS] had knowledge of the intention to take up this resolution today, after we were earlier assured that no controversial business would be brought up today.

The statement of the next-to-the-ranking member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the minority side, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH] has assured us that, until the resolution was introduced, he had no knowledge of it. It did not come to the House from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, nor with the approval of that committee. Nevertheless, it is here.

The resolution itself is a tricky, weasel-worded, double-talk proposal. It is so worded that no one can vote against it without voting contrary to well-known facts.

The resolution calls upon the United Nations to declare the Chinese Communists to be the aggressors in the present situation. Everyone knows that the North Koreans were the aggressors when they crossed the thirty-eighth parallel.

Everyone knows that at the present time the Chinese Communists are the aggressors. Unfortunately now, and for some weeks past, successful aggressors.

The resolution is tricky because if one votes in accordance with the fact, he must vote for the the resolution. But on the other hand, a vote for the resolution will be construed as a vote in favor of United Nations. I want none of United Nations.

Tomorrow the papers will be saying, as will the New Deal internationalist editors, columnists, and radio commentators, that the House—Republicans included—notwithstanding the November vote of the people to the contrary, gave all-out endorsement to United Nations. That the Congress of the United States, notwithstanding the sentiment expressed in the Midwest against surrendering our sovereignty to the United Nations, putting our trust, our confidence, our destiny in the hands of United Nations, is endorsing United Nations with all its blunders, is calling for all-out war by asking United Nations to declare the Chinese Communists to be the aggressors. Having declared the Chinese Communists to be the aggressors, the next, the only logical step which will be to ask United Nations to declare war against China. Who will fight that war? The United States.

In the days to come Republicans are going to hear a great deal about the action of the House which will soon be taken. In the days to come we will be told that we have committed ourselves to two things:

First. That we have endorsed and placed our future course of action in the hands of the United Nations.

Second. That by our action today, having requested the United Nations to declare the Chinese Communists to be aggressors, we have, by implication, asked the United Nations to declare war against China.

Added up, the adoption of this resolution is an endorsement of the policy of Acheson, of Truman, of involving us in world war III. It will be cited as a commitment to any war which United Nations may declare.

Bitter, disastrous experience in Korea tells us that the burden of carrying on this war, no matter where it may be fought, will fall upon the United States.

This declaration adopted today is a commitment, we will be told, to the sacrificing of the lives of perhaps a million or more young Americans in what I consider to be a hopeless effort to, with land armies, win a war in Asia—another one in Europe.

Humbly, may I ask, is it not cowardly, is it not a confession of incompetency, of a lack of ability, of statesmanship, for the Congress to ask a powerless, quarrelsome debating society like United Nations to determine the foreign policy of the United States?

In November the people expressed dissatisfaction with the foreign policy of the Achesons, of Mr. Truman. The people do not want war. They certainly do not want a war which is to be fought by foot soldiers in China, in Asia, in Europe, against overwhelming numbers for the salvation of so-called allies who will not do their share of the fighting.

If the internationalists in Congress, if those who are determined to involve us in an all-out world war III, want that issue decided by the Congress, why not bring it up by a plain declaration which all can understand?

Parliamentary procedure prohibits an accurate, adequate expression of opinion as to the method which has been followed in connection with this resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Is it not possible that the adoption of this resolution will be construed to mean an endorsement of what the President has done in Korea?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Of course, and worse than that, it is an endorsement of Acheson's incompetency. I am not so much concerned about that, for that is in the past, as I am about the construction of the resolution as it will be applied to future action. I think it is an entirely wrong procedure for any one member or two members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to ignore the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH], who speaks for the Midwest. I do not see how the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS] could do it; I do not see where he gets the nerve; I do not see how he can presume to come in here with that kind of thing, then try to put us on record in favor of the UN, when he knows the people of his State are disgusted with the UN.

The Republican whip was not consulted; the policy committee of the Republican Party was not consulted, so I am advised; certainly the membership as a whole knew nothing of it—there is barely a majority of the Members here.

It is a back-door endorsement of UN, of the Truman-Acheson policy, of getting us into world war III. Talk about democracy in action. Here is a procedure with but a bare majority of the House present by which, without adequate debate, we go on record endorsing UN, asking its aid, when we know it has none to give and no disposition to give it if it had. Our action today may hereafter be construed as a commitment to send thousands of our men to the slaughter grounds. I want no part of or in UN; nor am I endorsing the Acheson or Truman foreign policy.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I think this is entirely too serious a subject to continue without a quorum, and I renew my point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

DECLARING THE CHINESE COMMUNIST AUTHORITIES AN AGGRESSOR IN KOREA

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BATTLE].

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, the serious situation in the world is uppermost in all of our minds. We have all lost patience with diplomatic niceties when our loved ones are being killed in Korea. Our people back home are facing the hard facts of life realistically and they are expecting our Government to act realistically. My people, and I am sure the people all over the country, want hard-hitting, intelligent leadership not only from the military, not only from the Executive, but also from the Congress of the United States. In my judgment, this is a good opportunity for the House of Representatives to demonstrate the leadership that is expected of it by the people throughout our country. It is unfortunate that the chairman of our Committee on Foreign Affairs, Judge KEE, has been in the hospital, and that our committee has not been organized to date. However, this cannot be helped. Normally such a resolution would go to our committee before coming to the floor for debate, but there is not time for this action now.

Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in backing the resolution that has been introduced jointly by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], which says that it is the sense of the Congress that the United Nations should brand Red China as a world aggressor. I think it is important to take this action. The firm stand that the United Nations took last summer gave great hope for an enforced peace throughout the world.

It is very disappointing that the UN has not been stronger in implementing the action which it started. It is impossible for the United States to bring about peace in the world by ourselves so we cannot afford to let the United Nations degenerate into a mere debating society. I think we should join the executive department of our Government and our representatives in the United Nations in saying that Red China should be branded a world aggressor. I personally think we should go further and put an economic embargo on Russia and Red China. But that is not the issue here.

The issue before us today is whether or not the Congress is willing to act, to go on record and to show some leadership in strengthening the UN and in bringing about peace in the world. I hope this resolution will be unanimously adopted.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as there was such a small handful in the House at the time this question came up for debate, I wonder if it would not be possible to have the resolution again read to the Congress.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be again read.

There being no objection, the Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, a further parliamentary inquiry. Is it possible for a Member to offer a substitute or an amendment to the resolution?

The SPEAKER. Not unless the gentleman from Massachusetts yields for that purpose.

Mr. SHAFER. Would the gentleman from Massachusetts yield for that purpose?

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman will not.

Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 minute.

Mr. Speaker, I want it distinctly understood in relation to the Members who are absent today, and in order that their constituents may thoroughly understand the situation, that such Members were justified in assuming that no business would come up today. However, this is a matter of such urgency that it is an exception to the rule. As to those Members who are not here today, I want the RECORD clearly to show that their absence is justifiable and, whether they are Republican Members or Democratic Members, in accordance with the announcement which I made as to the program they were justified in governing themselves accordingly not expecting that any roll call would come up today.

I am anxious that that statement appear in the RECORD.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. ARENDS. I appreciate the statement that the majority leader has just made for the benefit of those Members who are not here today after some of us had told them that they could be absent.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. VORYS. Would the gentleman join in the unanimous-consent request that all Members may extend their remarks, let us say at this point?

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE UNITED NATIONS CANNOT UNITE ITS OWN MEMBERS

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, we were saved from an abject surrender in the Korean area by our enemies—not by the action of the United Nations. The United Nations offered to surrender on the terms first proposed by the Communist government of China. Had this been accepted, the United Nations would have forfeited the right to further existence.

Those who are supposed to know now claim this offer to surrender to Communist China was a diplomatic act—that when the offer was made the UN knew it would not be accepted, and when refused by China, the United States could put through a resolution branding Communist China as an aggressor. Is this the kind of body the United Nations is? Do we have to go to such extremes in order to get the United Nations to act? It is obvious to everyone that when China troops invaded South Korea, China was guilty of aggression—if the United Nations does not know that much, what useful purpose is it serving? If we are to abjectly bow before the Communist invaders of Korea in order to get this body to see what is going on, and in branding it accordingly, it shows the United Nations is not able to agree on even simple things. The sooner we begin to follow our own direction and refrain from following such an impotent and useless body, the better it will be for us. Who gave the United Nations power over the sovereign United States to move as the United Nations directs in this war? If any such power was given by anyone, it was an unconstitutional transfer of the sovereign power of the people of the United States.

No unity of action can hope to be secured from this body. India wants us to clasp the Chinese Communists to our bosom like a long-lost brother, but what is India contributing to the fighting effort? Rhee, President of South Korea, says that if we permit the Japanese to rearm and enter the war, his army will fight the Japanese, yet he wants us to remain and fight against the hordes of Communist China.

The Japanese should be rearmed. They should enter the war. Nationalist China should be rearmed, and they should enter the war. Both want to fight—are anxious to fight. And what logic is the United Nations exercising in preventing this? India does not want that to happen. England does not want that to happen. First, because India will have to show her hand—either be for us or against us. England does not want war with China; second, because she will lose her trade with the Communists, which she has already recognized. England does not want to lose Hong Kong, the center of her trade. If the wars should spread to an all-out war with Communist China, England will have to fish or cut bait. She is either with us or against us. There can be no half-hearted action taken if we intend to stop the invasion of South Korea. That is what the United Nations is up against—there can be no agreement among nations with such diversity of interests.

The purpose of the organic act of the United Nations was to stop aggression; an attack on one nation would be considered an attack against all nations in the United Nations.

How can aggression be stopped? If it could be stopped by reason and argument, then the United Nations was unnecessary. The United Nations was set up to stop aggression by force if necessary, and when force has to be used, the United Nations suddenly discovers that the available force is the United States; that other nations in the United Nations, like India, do not want to use force. England shies away from it. Western Europe has only eight divisions. South America—all the nations there—do not have a man on the battlefields. Yet they are strong in debate. Not one of these nations has stood up to the problem. They have side-stepped and let us take the brunt of the defense of their security, as well as our own.

All nations owe us money and are maneuvering to get more, and, to get right down to talking common sense, most of these nations hate us—or will if we do not give them more money.

It was a grave mistake to start loaning to these countries in the first place; it would be a bigger mistake to keep it up. If the United Nations will just fold up for a while and keep still, I think it possible for us to rearm Japan and Nationalist China and clear the Chinese Reds out of Korea. Stop that aggression. Finish our job. And then obey no more orders from an incompetent, unaccountable body named the United Nations.

Following that, we should make no move to wade into Europe to defend lukewarm nations who apparently do not want to defend themselves. We can, if we do not change our course, so deplete ourselves in resources and manpower that we shall be unable to defend ourselves.

Until the other members of the United Nations show signs of wanting to stay united and fighting in one common cause, we should not depend upon them in the slightest degree. The United Nations got us into this war in Korea, but we cannot depend upon it to get us out.

Debate, procrastination, unlimited policy of the United Nations has clearly demonstrated that we ought never to transfer any of the sovereignty of the United States to the United Nations or any other body under the sun. The members of the United Nations will have to realize one thing clearly—that we do not need their help nearly as much as they will need ours, and that we absolutely cannot prepare for our own defense and, at the same time, prepare the defenses for every member of the body. I think it is evident that we have the spirit to defend democracy; and if our partners cannot be moved to a spirit of self-defense, it is just as certain as night follows day that the purpose and objects of the United Nations has utterly failed.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Speaker, there have been some pretty wild remarks made here. This is certainly not a declaration of war against Red China nor is it an endorsement or ratification of President Truman's action in sending troops into Korea without consultation with Congress. The resolution merely says it is the sense of the House that the United Nations declare that the Chinese Reds are aggressors. If they are not aggressors, I do not know the meaning of the word. The United Nations should have taken this action a long time ago. If they do not do so now, they might as well pack up and go home. The American people will have no further confidence in the organization.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, it is difficult for some of us to understand why this resolution should come to the floor without notice to the membership or even to the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House to which it should have been referred. It has been suggested that it is an emergency matter. I ask the question: Where has the leadership been in recent weeks? In what respect has the situation changed by which all at once and without notice the leadership brings this resolution to the floor?

It appears that not more than a half dozen of the 435 Members of the House even knew it would be submitted today.

It is not the resolution that I criticize, but it is the manner in which the leadership of this House and the administration it represents is handling legislation and is guiding the affairs of this country. The least you could have done is to have let this resolution go over for 2 or 3 days. If it were so important, as you now indicate, then you should have brought it before the House 2 or 3 weeks ago.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely believe the resolution offered jointly by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK], the Democratic leader, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], the Republican leader, expressing that it is the sense of the House of Representatives that the United States should vote affirmatively branding Communist Red China as an aggressor in Korea, is timely and should be adopted.

There can be no logical argument against the fact that Red China is the aggressor in Korea, and there should be no hesitation on the part of the United Nations to adopt a resolution to make this a fact and removing all doubt as to the aggressive position Red China has assumed.

In my opinion the resolution should also be adopted to uphold the hands and give support to the capable and courageous United States representative at the United Nations, Warren Austin, as well as to give support and encouragement to some of the doubtful nations that will soon be called upon to vote on the resolution at Lake Success.

It is time, and I trust not too late, for the United States to take a clear-cut and undeniable position on the Korean crisis in order to remove any doubt of appeasement or lack of courage on the part of this Nation in declaring that Red China has taken a wanton and aggressive position in Korea for which they, with the help of Soviet Russia, shall stand responsible before the peoples of the world.

All of the red tape and dilatory debate at the United Nations should be limited to a minimum in coming to a conclusion on this resolution and by the adoption of the resolution before us by the House of Representatives, we will have, in my opinion, expressed the desire and intention of the vast majority of the American people.

Those member nations of the United Nations who, for one reason or another, may vote against the adoption of a resolution branding Red China the aggressor in Korea will, in my opinion, thereby place themselves in the position of being unfriendly to the United States and unwilling to fight Communist aggression with the only effective weapons Red China and Russia will respect, namely, strength, courage, and force. Time is of the essence in this instance, and it is my hope that this resolution will be speedily adopted and that consequent effective action will be taken by the United Nations at once.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I believe in the principle of this resolution. There is no question, in my mind, that the Chinese Communists are aggressors.

However, I am sorry it came before the House in the manner in which it came, namely by unanimous consent obtained, when there were only a few Members present on the floor.

We all know from our experience that sometimes there are lurking dangers in matters submitted to the House for its consideration. We do not know what the ramification of the present proposal may be. I am not charging bad faith on the part of anyone. However, I saw a statement the other day which I could not keep out of my mind as I was listening to the discussion of this resolution and when I voted for the resolution. It was made by Mr. Nehru, of India. It was to the effect that if we declare the Chinese Reds aggressors that may shut the door to further negotiations and it might start a world war.

By our vote today we have not gained one vote in the United Nations. We have a representative there, and a very capable one, in Senator Austin. Why not leave the handling of the matter to him who has been on the firing line for us ever since the United Nations was organized. He will know how to handle it to the best advantage to ourselves and to the free world.

Impulsive actions frequently bring bad results. The world is so explosive today that we must weigh our words and weigh the consequences of our conduct as a Congress. Individual Members may make irresponsible and sometimes audacious statements. But the Congress, before it acts, should proceed with caution, with full knowledge of the implications of its conduct, and, with the background of exhaustive and intelligent investigation by one of its committees. That was not had in this case. And since our expression was not required to get the necessary votes to pass this resolution through the United Nations and since our State Department has already expressed itself as being desirous of getting such action I do not see why we should rush through Congress a bill, that in a way, strait-jackets the conduct and the efforts of our own representative in the United Nations.

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, occasionally the charge is made that Congress abuses its responsibility as a legislative body. And occasionally, in the past, hasty and ill-advised action by the House has made that charge understandable.

Today, however, the Eighty-second Congress of the United States recklessly and irresponsibly abdicated its duty by adopting without serious consideration and under shotgun procedure a resolution that is fraught with unlimited perilous possibilities.

Mr. Speaker, America can probably survive a weak Congress or even a stupid one, but it cannot survive a Congress that abdicates its deliberative responsibilities.

On Wednesday, January 17, the majority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK], made the following categorical pledge to the House membership:

> There will be no legislative business at all on Friday.

But at 1:30 Friday afternoon we are suddenly called to vote on a resolution of unlimited implications.

Mr. Speaker, I am appalled and ashamed to be part of such a travesty on our system of parliamentary government. I protest this betrayal of our duty.

If this affair is a sample of what the American people are to expect from now on from Congress, we are already lost to totalitarianism.

Mr. Speaker, I hope and pray that the procedural tactics of this afternoon will never be repeated in the United States House of Representatives.

Mr. HILLINGS. Mr. Speaker, today the House of Representatives passed a resolution branding Communist China as an aggressor in the war in Korea. I voted for this resolution because I have long felt that Communist China is the tool of the Soviet Union, carrying out the aims of the Kremlin to destroy all freedom-loving nations. Certainly our boys in Korea recognize that the Chinese Communists are evil aggressors, and the American public has long been of the same mind, despite the failure of our State Department to come to the same conclusion until a few weeks ago.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, the resolution did not go far enough. The resolution should also have pointed out that the United Nations has been derelict in its duty in not taking unified action against the Chinese Communists when the first hordes from Red China crossed the Yalu River last October and invaded Korea. It has been a great tragedy that the UN has failed to awaken to the realities of the situation, instead of degenerating into a debating society over the vital and obvious fact that Red China is an aggressor. It is my sincere hope that the UN will act immediately to officially take the same stand made today by the representatives of the American people.

Mr. Speaker, it is most unfortunate that as this resolution is passed by the House the same Secretary of State is still in office who fostered and developed the policy which enabled Communist China to send its forces into Korea. It was Mr. Acheson who told the American people that we could do business with the Chinese Communists and that we must force the government of Chiang Kai-shek to submit to the atheistic and totalitarian policies of the Kremlin. It was Mr. Acheson who said, "We must let the dust settle in China," and who abandoned the Nationalist Government, our wartime ally in the struggle against the Japanese, thus allowing the Red hordes to sweep across Asia.

To carry out the full intent of this resolution, which implies that we must abandon the false concept of appeasement of communism so long favored by the present Secretary of State, I urge the President to remove Mr. Acheson from his high office and replace him with a man in whom we can have real confidence at this grave hour. It is essential that this action be taken if our people are to develop a unified and affirmative American foreign policy to meet the challenge of Communist aggression at home and abroad.

Mr. Speaker, now that the House has taken this positive position in opposition to the aggression of the forces of Red China, I call upon the President to enlist immediately the active support of Nationalist China in the Korean War. The help of the 500,000 troops of Chiang Kai-shek now on the island of Formosa would greatly relieve the pressure on our American boys now holding the line against a numerically superior Communist enemy in Korea. It would help to return more of our boys home alive. There is no sensible reason for continuing to refuse the offer to help extended to the UN by Chiang, and I urge that we welcome the active support of Nationalist China, the only anti-Communist force in China which has offered to come to the aid of the free world.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, on January 9 the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS] and I addressed the House on the subject of the crisis faced by the United Nations. We asked at that time that this world organization realistically face up to its obligation to declare the Chinese Communists aggressors. I shall, of course, support this resolution and only regret that the action was not taken earlier. It is conceivable that, if we had acted last week, our representatives in the United Nations would not have bowed to the demands of other members for further appeasement in the Far East.

Fortunately, the rejection of the so-called cease-fire resolution by the Peiping regime has relieved this country from the necessity of sitting down at a council table with the murderous brigands who have been slaughtering United Nations troops, consisting primarily of our own American boys.

If the United Nations now lacks the moral integrity to denounce the big aggression by Communist China as they did the little aggression by North Korea, it will undoubtedly mark the end of any usefulness of that agency for the maintenance of peace.

When the United Nations took action last June at the time the North Koreans crossed the thirty-eighth parallel, we assumed 90 percent of the burden of resisting aggression so far as manpower is concerned and 100 percent of the burden in financial expense, of what was designated as a police action.

In dollars we are in the red as a result to the extent of more than $14,000,000,000. But that is only a relatively minor incident when one looks at the casualty figures and sees that our announced casualties to date are over 45,000. Of these, 8,000 have been killed. No dollar sign can describe that loss. Only the families and loved ones of these heroes can sense the true significance of our Nation's sacrifice.

If the decision taken by the United Nations in June is now to be compromised and its moral effect set at naught either because member nations are unwilling to sacrifice economic or financial advantage, or because they fear the military power of the Chinese Communists or their Russian masters, certainly it will be our obligation to reexamine our unwavering adherence to the cooperative spirit which constitutes the very lifeblood of an organization dedicated to international cooperation. While we have again and again demonstrated our willingness to make concessions for the sake of achieving unity, there is a point beyond which we cannot go in permitting our own hands to be tied and our decisions coerced. We have already passed this point. This resolution will serve notice that we in Congress realize this fact, as do those whom we represent.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

Mr. WOOD of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to commit the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the resolution?

Mr. WOOD of Idaho. I am, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to commit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WOOD of Idaho moves that the resolution now pending before the House be committed to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the previous question is ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WOOD].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GROSS) there were—ayes 30, noes 161.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present, and I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-seven Members are present; a quorum.

So the motion to commit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DEANE] is recognized for 20 minutes.

DR. GORDON S. SEAGRAVE

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Speaker, in the passage of the unprecedented resolution a few moments ago, and which I have been advocating, and considering the world-shaking events that are taking place, it is rather difficult to resolve our thinking down to a human individual. However, I want to bring to the attention of the House today a very brief story of a great American who at this very minute is languishing in a prison cell in a foreign country thousands of miles from our beautiful city of Washington.

Briefly, I would like to submit this statement:

THE WORTH OF A HUMAN INDIVIDUAL

Mr. Speaker, the world is passing through a period of great confusion and uncertainty. It is a time when thoughts of war and the threat of war weigh heavily upon us all. This Congress once again is being called upon to consider measures of far-reaching consequence to the future of the Nation and, indeed, to the future of all mankind.

Because the problems with which we must deal are of such an enormous stature we may hesitate to concern ourselves with matters of lesser dimension. Because war is a tragedy of such incalculable proportions, we may be less inclined to dwell upon a tragedy which threatens a mere individual and his family—especially when it is being enacted in a land remote from these shores, in a setting unknown to most of the Members of this House.

But it is in the nature of our way of life that we do not ignore the individual no matter how pressing may be the tempo of the times, no matter how manifold the difficulties which confront us.

It is in the nature of our way of life to do all we can to right a wrong done to any man, and to alleviate his suffering if that be possible.

Because I believe with all my heart in this way of life, Mr. Speaker, I venture to bring before the House, the tragic story of one man. I speak of Dr. Gordon S. Seagrave. That name is vaguely familiar to most of us. The men who fought the early campaign in Burma during World War II would know it well. Countless native physicians and nurses who were trained by him would recognize it. And those of us who followed Stilwell's epic retreat into India during 1942 will remember the equally heroic story of the Burma Surgeon, who likewise authored the Burma Surgeon Returns.

Mr. Speaker, for a quarter of a century, Dr. Seagrave lived and toiled in Burma. He went abroad as a medical missionary with a dream, a basketful of salvaged surgical instruments, and a faithful wife. He went back to the land in which he was born, for generations of his family before him had lived and served as missionaries in Burma.

Dr. Seagrave did not settle into the ease and luxury of the foreign colony in Rangoon. Carried along by a driving spirit and a determination to serve humanity, he went north into the country of the Karens, a large ethnic group, which had shown much inclination to embrace the Christian faith. Among these people, in the village of Namkham, some 500 miles north of Rangoon, Dr. Seagrave and his family finally settled down. During the years that followed, he labored with these people to establish a modern hospital. He tended the sick. He trained nurses, doctors, and public-health workers. Thousands of people lived better and healthier lives because of his inspiration.

Then came the war. His hospital lay in the path of the early Japanese invasion of Burma and Seagrave was forced to leave it. He joined General Stilwell as a medical officer and throughout the conflict served with Stilwell's Chinese soldiers, receiving for his devotion to duty several decorations and the plaudits of the allied world.

With the defeat of Japan, Dr. Seagrave returned to his beloved hospital service. The willing hands of neighbors joined with his in rebuilding that remarkable center of healing in the wilderness of northern Burma.

This good man wanted nothing more than to carry on with his vital work. He had no mission, no aim, except as a service to humanity to heal the sick and to train native doctors and nurses to do the same.

Events in Burma, however, were to rule otherwise. Scarcely had that country become independent in 1948 when revolts flared in many areas. Among those who rose in armed rebellion against the Government were the Karens who believed that their group was entitled to a greater degree of autonomy than the Burmese Government was willing to grant.

Dr. Seagrave's hospital once again lay in the line of fire. This time, however, he did not leave. He felt, as he had every right to feel, that both sides would understand his position, that they would recognize, notwithstanding the unfortunate civil conflict, that his work was for the good of their country as a whole.

The town of Namkham changed hands several times in the course of rebellion and Dr. Seagrave found himself first under one jurisdiction then under another. In these circumstances his position became increasingly precarious. He sought to do the right thing and in view of his experience this right thing was to preserve the hospital for the benefit of all Burma and to aid the sick and the hurt.

Suddenly, on August 18, 1950, Dr. Seagrave was arrested by officials of the Government of Burma who were then in possession of the town. He was flown to Rangoon and charged with treason. For weeks he languished in jail, where he suffered from serious illnesses.

His long trial began on October 12, 1950. This week, on January 17, he was convicted of treason in helping the Karen rebels and was sentenced to 6 years imprisonment. That sentence, I am given to understand, is now being appealed to the high court in Rangoon. I do not wish, therefore, to say anything here on the floor that may prejudice the ultimate decision in any fashion whatever.

I may state, however, that I have followed this developing tragedy from its inception. Dr. Seagrave's experience is but the misfortune of one man and his family—the shattering of a noble dream of service to humanity. It is, at the same time, a part of a far larger misfortune—the grave internal difficulty which confronts the new nation of Burma and the possible deterioration of relations between the Burmese and ourselves.

CONGRESSIONAL MISSION TO BURMA

Mr. Speaker, I was in Rangoon on September 20 and 21 in 1949. I was there as a member of a mission sponsored by this House. On my return, I reported to the President and to the Speaker on my observations. I had found a country—a beautiful country, highly endowed by nature—wasting away its blood and treasure in civil strife. Conditions of life were so insecure that the principal government officials found it necessary to work behind guarded barbwire barricades.

Mr. Speaker, in these circumstances, the people of Burma—Karen and Kachin and Burmese alike—were unable to enjoy the fruits of their newly won independence. So far as I am able to determine the situation has not changed to this day. Real peace still eludes those unhappy people.

INTERNAL PROBLEMS OF BURMA

I well know, Mr. Speaker, that the internal problems of Burma must be solved primarily by the people of that country themselves. But it is the duty of all peoples, no matter where they may live, to work for peace and to speak out for peace whenever there is an opportunity to obtain it without the sacrifice of principle. In 1949, I urged that Burma seek to find peaceful solutions for its internal problems and I do so again today. I do so, in part, because I believe such a solution to be in the best interests of that land and, in part, because I realize that if there had been peace Dr. Seagrave would be going on now with his noble work instead of languishing in confinement in Rangoon.

I repeat that I believe the internal problems of Burma must be solved by the Burmese themselves. Dr. Seagrave's case, however, appears to me to be not exclusively an internal problem. It is rather, one which has grave implications for the future of our own relations with Burma. I do not refer merely to the fact that he is an American citizen. I have in mind an observation which I made during my stay in Rangoon and which I duly reported on my return. It was my opinion then, and nothing has since occurred to change it, that American missionaries were being subjected to undue pressure and harassment in carrying on their work.

ADONIRAM JUDSON AND JUDSON COLLEGE

I refer particularly to the Judson College question which came to my attention at the time. Judson College is an institution of higher learning in Rangoon which was established some hundred years ago by Adoniram Judson and which was operated by the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society until it was closed by the Burmese Nationalist Government. Throughout its existence this school has sought to serve Christianity by serving the people of Burma. Many of the present Burmese leaders received their education at Judson. In spite of its record, however, that school has been taken over by the Burmese Government, and this Government has so far failed to pay any compensation for its occupancy, or the payment to the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society of New York City of its claim which represents a one-half undivided interest in the college.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF TRAINED DIPLOMATIC RELATIONSHIPS

Mr. Speaker, Dr. Seagrave's ordeal and the Judson College affair may seem unimportant in a world which is already at war in Korea and totters on the brink of a much greater catastrophe. But it is precisely in such matters—seemingly local and isolated in themselves—that friendship or enmity between nations very frequently begins.

Our country desires to maintain friendly relations with Burma. I think we have already given some evidence of our intention in this respect. When the Union of Burma obtained its independence, we were among the first nations to extend recognition. Since that time we have instituted a number of measures of cooperation. Out of funds obtained from the sale of United States surplus property in Burma, we have established a Fulbright program with that country. Under this program, it has been possible to send American teachers to Rangoon and under Public Law 402 of the Eightieth Congress, the Smith-Mundt Act, Burmese have been brought to this country to study and to teach.

We are now prepared to go ahead with a well-rounded program under ECA which will provide assistance to Burma in agriculture, public health, industry and national economic development. Projects are under consideration which should help the Burmese to help themselves in building a more stable, a more fruitful, and more progressive nation.

Mr. Speaker, all these arrangements represent cooperation between the people of Burma and the people of the United States. They can have a real, a lasting meaning, however, only if they are conducted in an atmosphere of trust and tolerance and respect on both sides.

DEEP CONCERN BEING EXPRESSED BY OUTSTANDING AMERICANS

It is for this reason that I particularly deplore the tragedy which has overtaken Dr. Seagrave. In a very real sense, he represented a major link in the relationship between our two countries. He is an American, a fine American who has devoted his life to serving the people of Burma. Here is a telegram which came to my office yesterday from Dr. Theodore Adams, outstanding theologian and church leader, and minister of the First Baptist Church of Richmond, Va.:

Deeply deplore action against Seagrave. Have known him for years as personal friend, able missionary, and loyal American.

This is typical of the many wires and letters which I have received. When I was in Rangoon, I had the pleasure of meeting Mrs. Seagrave, who is a noble and courageous woman. For years she worked by the side of the doctor in Burma, managing to help him in his work while at the same time raising a fine American family. She has since returned to this country and is now living in Baltimore and I have been in constant touch with her concerning her husband's plight.

THE URGENCY OF THE RELEASE OF DR. SEAGRAVE

Mr. Speaker, I do not pretend to understand all the circumstances surrounding the arrest, trial, and conviction of Dr. Seagrave. I do know that the conditions of unrest which prevail in Burma and which I have described were a major factor. I do know, too, that his permanent removal from the service of the Burmese people would be a genuine loss to them and to Burmese-American friendship. It is for this reason that I am contemplating introducing a resolution in this House calling on the President to urge the Government of Burma to release the doctor and to restore him to the service of humanity.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEANE. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. As a member of the Baptist denomination I want to thank the gentleman for the speech he has made here today in behalf of Dr. Seagrave. I have known of the Judson missionary movement in Burma for many, many years. It has made a valuable contribution to the life of the Burmese community. I share with the gentleman my deep concern over the arrest and conviction of Dr. Seagrave and I am hopeful that the appellate court will reverse the lower court in its findings.

Mr. DEANE. They should. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEANE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEATING. As the gentleman perhaps knows, I served for 3 years during the war in the China-Burma-India theater and am personally familiar with the remarkable work which Dr. Seagrave did in Burma. I have been at his hospital and know of the untiring devotion which he gave to his work there. Although there may have been personality differences which caused some differences of opinion regarding his service at the time, I feel certain that I can speak for the hundreds of thousands of men who served in that theater in saying that we certainly hope there will be a different issue of the present trial in Burma than the one which has happened today. I feel sure that all of the world hopes and rather confidently expects that the appellate court will, as I would put it, see the light in this case.

Mr. DEANE. I thank the gentleman.

THE NEED OF MAINTAINING FRIENDSHIP BETWEEN BURMA AND THE UNITED STATES

In closing, Mr. Speaker, my motive in this respect, I repeat, would not be to intrude upon the internal affairs of Burma. I would do so only because I believe that the cause of friendship between our countries would be strengthened by such a course and because I believe with all my heart that Dr. Seagrave, who already has given so much to Burma, can still be of service to the people of that land. I therefore respectfully request the officials of the Burmese Government, in behalf of my colleagues and myself, and the great number of outstanding Americans who know, love, and highly respect Dr. Gordon S. Seagrave, to effectuate his release and thus avoid the strained relations that are developing in this country toward the Burmese Government because of the unjust treatment toward this great American, Dr. Gordon S. Seagrave.

ANOTHER COSTLY BUREAUCRATIC ERROR

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, a source of never-ending amazement to me is the working of the bureaucratic mind, as it may be observed here in Washington.

For the most part the bureaucrat performs a dull task, over and over, until even the reason for it is forgotten.

Small wonder, then, that he falls into a mental state wherein the task itself, rather than its purpose, becomes all-important.

Only too often, as a result, when he is faced with the necessity of a change, even in some small detail of his routine, he becomes so confused as to make the most ridiculous errors.

We see it happen almost every day.

But this tendency toward bureaucratic absurdities is not confined to Washington alone. Wherever bureaucrats operate, sooner or later, one of these horrendous asininities crops up.

The latest to be called to my attention is described in a letter from one of my Michigan constituents.

He is one of those farmers who spends his winter evenings nowadays in poring over the complexities of an agricultural income-tax report, instead of hustling through with the chores so he may drive into town for the movies, the church supper, or the dance in the Odd Fellows hall.

Now it appears that he, and all his fellow agriculturists in the State, have been left dangling as the income-tax deadline approaches.

Uncle Sam demands, under severe penalties, that income-tax returns shall be made promptly. But the tax forms—the proper ones at least—have not arrived.

It seems that the Bureau of Internal Revenue is seeking to get away from use of the short form, 1040A, and to require that everyone possible shall use the longer form, 1040.

The purpose, of course, is to keep a closer check on individual returns, and thus discourage chiseling under the prospectively higher tax rates.

One can easily picture some bureaucratic underling, in the offices of the Michigan collector of internal revenue, deciding that here was a chance to get after those farmers who fail to report as income foodstuffs consumed off the farm.

So Michigan farmers last month received four copies each of tax return form 1040, instead of the long and complicated agricultural income-tax return.

I gather from the letter that most Michigan farmers, of recent weeks, have spent many of their daylight hours driving frantically from one village post office to another in their sections of the State, waving useless 1040 forms and demanding the proper agricultural forms.

Their evenings, it may be surmised, have been spent in worrying about the whole thing, because the agricultural forms were not at once available.

No doubt the Michigan collector of internal revenue, when the error was discovered, moved at once to correct it. But it seems to me pretty silly; this business of vainly trying to plug one tax money leak at the expense of an even greater one.

I wonder whether this kind of thing is happening all over the country.

One letter of several I have received concerning this matter follows:

HOMER, MICH., January 16, 1951.

DEAR MR. SHAFER: I wonder if anyone has tipped you off in regard to the very costly error made in regard to farmers receiving the wrong forms and being forced to chase from one post office to the other to obtain farm returns for income tax.

Last week the branch county farm bureau in a radio program explained a very confusing and bothersome error had been made and farmers were receiving the wrong blanks, etc.

Then Monday along came ours and therein were four 1040 forms which, as you know, cannot be used in agriculture. If this is prevalent in Michigan, what a costly error for we tax burdened public. What an expense this is as those blanks, which no doubt cost a plenty, are thrown to the wind. To me this is gross inefficiency and in such an agency as this, should be curtailed. This probably does not come within your jurisdiction. However, it being in your district it probably is of some interest.

You need not answer this communication as it is not necessary. Far from a fair deal, it's a rotten deal to have to chase your legs off over such a mess and then listen to economy. Everywhere one meets his neighbor looking for blanks.

Yours truly.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the resolution passed this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HARVEY] is recognized for 15 minutes.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. Speaker, while I am looking forward to the possibility of serving on the great Committee on Agriculture in the House with anticipation, it is also with considerable reluctance that I am leaving the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. That committee has served, I think, a very, very useful function, not only within the Congress but to the people of the United States.

When I first came to Congress after a special election I was assigned to the Committee on Executive Expenditures. My first subcommittee activity was that of the Rizley subcommittee charged with investigating the disposal of war surplus. That chapter in the history of our country, as most of you recognize and appreciate, was not a very happy one. Millions, yes, billions of dollars' worth of physical assets of our country were dissipated in the disposal program. This disposition, of course, at the time our investigation was taking place, had largely been accomplished, so that in essence we were more or less locking the stable door after the horse had been stolen.

The great challenge that came to me out of that experience, however, was why such an occasion should happen and what could be done in the future to prevent its recurrence. It developed during the course of our investigation that the armed services had no uniform cataloging, nor did the supply agency or the disposal agency that was charged with disposing of this material have a cataloging system whereby they could know what they had to sell and dispose of it in an orderly, efficient, and economical fashion. For this reason, as I previously stated, billions of dollars worth of material were sold more or less on a pig-in-a-poke basis and a great loss was sustained by our Government and the taxpayers.

There is a way that this can be corrected, and I think largely as a result of the investigation of our committee the armed services through the War Munitions Board established a project designed to correct the situation. They called this the Federal cataloging program. It was designed to bring into the armed services, having been joined together as a common unit of defense, a common unit of cataloging, so that the armed services could better distribute their procurement, could make their procurement more economical, and in the event of the declaration of material as surplus such material could be disposed of by a civilian agency economically and efficiently.

The subcommittee upon which I served in the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments passed during the Eighty-first Congress a bill establishing the General Services Administration. This was a counterpart attempt on the part of the Congress to set up a logical, clear-cut, and efficient agency to take care of the procurement needs for the civilian branches of our Government. It was also charged with the responsibility of distributing or disposing of surpluses generated even by the armed services. This surplus material could not, as I have previously stated, be disposed of efficiently unless the civilian disposal agency knew what they had to sell. The armed services, in embarking upon a Federal cataloging program through the agency of the War Munitions Board, estimated when it was inaugurated in 1948 that it would take 4 years to complete this project involving many hundreds of technical employees so that the job could be done efficiently and effectively.

The subcommittee of which I am a member has conscientiously followed the progress of this project. A year ago, or less than a year ago we called Admiral Ring up for a conference before our subcommittee and we asked him to give us a statement of the progress of this Federal cataloging program, which he did. At that time we urged him to step up the progress of this program so that it could be completed because even then it was evident we were going to embark upon an enormously increased procurement program for the armed services, and it was highly important that the job of cataloging, and the catalog itself, be established thoroughly before our agencies were charged with receiving vast quantities of material. They have assured us that this program will be completed during the year of 1951. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BONNER] is chairman of the subcommittee that has been following the progress of this project, and just before the adjournment of the second session of the Eighty-first Congress we made a trip to the naval depot at Mechanicsburg, Pa. At that time we were impressed with the progress being made, but likewise were we impressed with the tremendous tasks involved. I would like to give you just one simple little illustration, if I might, which will, I think, show the vastness of the project and how complicated it can become. We were told up there, during the course of our inspection, that as simple a thing as a cotter pin, the same identical cotter pin, had 1,108 different listings within the naval depot at Mechanicsburg. That says nothing about the listing of the same particular commodity in the other branches of the service, or even other divisions of the Navy. That meant there had to be 1,108 receptacles for this cotter pin at the depot. There was no way of knowing when the cotter pins were exhausted from one of those 1,108 compartments; there were 1,107 other compartments from which the same identical article may have been secured. So you go all through the whole series of procurement possibilities. As a matter of fact, when we totalized the items of use within the three branches of the armed services we found they totaled more than 12,000,000, and it was estimated that by eliminating duplications, and near-duplications and overlapping, the total number could be reduced to approximately 3,000,000 or 3,500,000 items.

The saving, Mr. Speaker, for the taxpayers, to say nothing of the increased efficiency of the armed services, will be tremendous. The taxes for the coming mobilization program are going to be very high; of that we can be assured. So I would say that the greatest possibility for actually saving money, to say nothing of increasing the efficiency of the armed services, can be accomplished if the Congress and the agencies which are carrying out this program coordinate their activities and insist that it not be a paper project but that it actually become a reality.

There is one other factor which I want to discuss briefly in conclusion, because it involves more than just merely a uniform cataloging system of common-use items. It involves the procurement of matériel. Let us take the subject of clothing for the armed services. There are just so many companies in this country that are capable of making and which will make clothing for the armed services. In the past we have found a great scrambling on the part of the procurement agencies of the various components of the armed services competing with one another for these production facilities. As a consequence, many times one branch of the armed services would tie up unneeded proportions of our production facilities. As a result, other branches would either have to insist upon new establishments being set up or would have to do without. So this involves a coordination of the purchasing program.

Here is another factor that I think deserves your consideration: For example, suppose there are six companies that are making clothing for the armed services. In normal times they have been producers of civilian clothing. We will say the armed services are going to require the production of about one-third of the total output. I suppose we could demand that two of those companies convert entirely to the making of armed services clothing. In order to do that they would have to give up their civilian market, which they would be loath to do. But you could take one-third of the production of all six of those companies and they would give you a better price, because two-thirds of their production facilities would be left for the maintenance of their civilian market. So the Federal cataloging program involves more than just getting material. It involves a coordinated procurement program that will enable the various branches of the armed services to achieve their goal, and do it in an orderly fashion; and to see that each branch of the service gets its requisites, and that it does not pile up unnecessary supplies. In that way they will be assured that next year they will get their equitable proportion of the production facilities.

I particularly wanted to make this statement to the House because I think the whole idea and the whole goal is important, not only to the Armed Services Committee and to the Appropriations Committee but it is important to the Ways and Means Committee from the standpoint of taxes. Certainly it is of great importance to all Members of the House. It is my fond hope that the House will continue to support this Federal catalog program and to insist that the armed services make of it a reality, and that the civilian component of our purchasing program also coordinate its activities and adopt the same catalog, which they are prepared to do, by the way, so that any surplus generated by the war will follow in smooth, logical fashion to the channels of disposal, and the tremendous waste that was entailed after World War II in the disposal program will not be repeated at the conclusion of this great struggle in which we are presently embarked.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARVEY. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. I completely agree with what the gentleman has said with respect to the importance of the program, and the importance of bringing this information to the attention of Members of the House. I think the gentleman has performed a real service in calling it, not only to the attention of the House but to the attention of the general public as well, because only from that source can we get the emphasis needed to put these reforms into effect.

Mr. HARVEY. I thank the distinguished gentleman.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARVEY. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman has given us a very interesting account of his work on this committee. I feel sure that we all share his view, that the study which he has advocated should be continued. As the gentleman leaves the Committee on Expenditures to go to the Committee on Agriculture, I feel personally, and I know a great many others share the same view, that I would like to express to the gentleman our thanks for the great aid which he has given us in resolving the questions that have come out of his committee. I personally have always turned to the gentleman from Indiana, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. RIEHLMAN], and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. LOVRE] for advice in connection with the problems that have come from his committee. I am personally grateful to the gentleman from Indiana for the distinguished service which he has performed.

Mr. HARVEY. I thank the gentleman. I want to say that I express my very best wishes and hopes for the continued success of the great Committee on Expenditures of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LUCAS). The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BATTLE] is recognized for 10 minutes.

A REPORT TO THE CONGRESS FROM THE PEOPLE OF THE NINTH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF ALABAMA, JANUARY 19, 1951

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker and distinguished Members of the House, it is my privilege to again report to the Congress the views and feelings of the people of my district, the Ninth Congressional District of Alabama. This report from my people is tremendously important, in my opinion, because of the deep feelings they have expressed to me in this grave hour.

The serious world situation is uppermost in their minds, and let me tell you they have no patience with diplomatic niceties when their sons, husbands, and loved ones are being sent to war, some of them for the second time in the last decade, and many parents are receiving that dreaded telegram from the Adjutant General saying "I regret to inform you—." The people are facing the hard facts of life realistically and they expect our Government to act realistically.

The Ninth Congressional District of Alabama wants two-fisted, hard-hitting, intelligent leadership from the Executive, from the military, from the Congress, and from everybody in a place of public trust. Let no one forget this important fact as our people are being rallied to make greater sacrifices and greater efforts which are necessary for the protection of our country.

The people of my district have been ready to go all out for some time. They are willing and able to do whatever is needed to protect our country if given a reasonable plan of action and the fighting leadership which we must have to be successful.

My people know that Korea is worse than the Pearl Harbor of World War II which left no doubt in anybody's mind about the job we had to do. They also know that our direction and objectives have not been clarified in this crisis and that the necessary measures to protect our country have not been put into effect. They want bold leadership, with a positive course of action toward a definite goal. They want the best brains in this country drafted to help the executive branch of our Government steer that course. This includes the decision on when and where to use the atomic bomb.

Although the President has the chief responsibility for foreign affairs, my people feel that Congress should not just sit back and rubber stamp the plans and programs of the executive department. Charting the destinies of 151,000,000 American people in this shrinking, explosive world is too grave a responsibility for the Executive alone and my people expect Congress to take an active part in the formation of our foreign policy. The world's greatest deliberative body should deliberate on the world's greatest question—the question of bringing about peace—and come up with some realistic solutions to our dilemma.

The people of my district and Alabama have always been foremost in rising to the defense of our country in time of crisis when the danger and course of action were fully understood. They will not follow blindly. They want to know the whole truth about the dangers we face, the odds that are against us, and the reasons for the course we take.

The fact is—and we might as well face it—that we are at war with Russia although the fighting at the present time is taking place in the Far East. We are already in a war for our freedom here at home, if not for our very existence. The odds against us are greater than at any time in the history of our country. Nothing short of an intelligent plan of action to fight the Communists inside and outside our country, backed by the full force of the people, will prevent our destruction.

It has been next to impossible for my people to reconcile the bitter reverses in a far-off land with what they have seen here at home. On the one hand they have suffered the loss of loved ones in Korea, the drafting of young boys, the rising spiral of inflation, the call for greater sacrifices, and an instinctive realization of the gravity of the world situation. On the other hand they have seen inadequately trained troops sent into combat without proper reinforcements, the publication of secret military data, enactment of half-way control measures, the lack of cooperation among the two political parties and the Executive in cleaning out the Communists in Government, talk about police action in Korea, the small amount of support from members of the United Nations, failure of the UN to brand Communist China as an aggressor, the insistence by England on UN recognition of Red China, and continued war shipments by the allies to Russia and her war-making satellites.

Is it any wonder that great hope of a simple, easy solution was aroused in so many minds by the speeches of ex-President Hoover and Senator TAFT? They said much that I agree with, but they also left out some impelling facts about the world situation that must be taken into account.

It has been suggested that small United States garrison forces could hold out in different parts of the world while friendly nations rearm. This is impossible. The slaughter of our troops and the capture of friendly nations would be a certainty in an open military conflict. Who can trust the Soviets to stop military aggression of their own accord? It has been inferred that America can stand alone. The facts do not give much support to this theory. We may be forced into such an undesirable position but it would be a short-sighted policy indeed to fail to help the development of economic, religious, and military resistance wherever we can find it. How else can atheistic aggression be stopped before it reaches our own shores? Our task will be increased a hundredfold if we try to go it alone.

All of us agree, however, that first priority should be given to building up our own defense. We demand it. We must also demand greater effort on the part of our allies, if they are to expect continued assistance from us. Not one of these countries, with the exception of Turkey, has waked up to its own peril to the extent of taking adequate military action.

Withdrawal of our troops from Korea may be a military necessity and it may be the wisest policy in view of the prospects of being thrown into an all-out war with China. So far China, with 450,000,000 people, has unleashed only a small part of her military forces. She has millions more in reserve. Russia is using Korea as a proving ground for tactics and equipment in preparation for bigger things to come. The solution depends upon our over-all policy regarding whether or not to abandon the entire Far East.

If we do not abandon the entire Far East, then all available forces must be used to stop Russia in that general area wherever and however it is militarily possible. The wraps must come off. Our fighting men and their families deserve this consideration. This would include strategic bombing wherever it is to our advantage. It would include the use of Korean guerrillas and troops, the estimated 1,500,000 Chinese guerrillas on the mainland, the 500,000 Chinese Nationalist troops on Formosa who must be rearmed, the Japanese, and other friendly nations. All must be used in a way that is most advantageous to our cause. Among the objectives of this course of action would be to prevent Russia from getting added industrial power and to keep her from being able to concentrate entirely in Europe.

To abandon the entire Far East will mean the immediate collapse of Japan, a country that has no arms at this time but has great industrial power. Another result of such a policy would be to leave Formosa and the friendly guerrillas in Korea and China helpless. The Philippines and Alaska would be seriously threatened so that the direct effect would be to move the war zone closer home and destroy the morale of our allies in Europe.

The same policy of withdrawal applied to Europe would mean the inevitable collapse of such industrial powers as Germany and England, along with the entire European Continent. This would hand over to Russia control of about 90 percent of the world's manpower, and a combined industrial capacity comparable to ours, backed up by the world's largest army—an army which is ready to go into action now.

In case we withdraw from Europe and the Far East either voluntarily or involuntarily, we could not count on anything but war coming to our own shores very quickly in the most devastating form yet known to man.

The greatest deterrent to a world war now is the temporary advantage we hold in the quantity and quality of the atomic bomb. However, we must bear in mind that Russia can send over one-way, suicide, sneak A-bomb attackers and level some of our cities at this very time. The power of our A-bomb is not great enough to win a war alone and our superiority in this field is fast diminishing. We must strengthen ourselves immediately to make up for this loss. The second greatest deterrent to a world war now is our long-range advantage in production which must be thrown into high gear before it is too late.

Mr. Speaker, our people in the ninth district are representative of America in that they have too much faith in our way of life, too much character, vitality, and independence to bow to Russia. My people know down deep in their hearts that the forces of evil are not going to conquer the world ultimately. Atheistic communism cannot dominate the minds of men very long because such unfortunate people will eventually realize that they have been deceived by false promises. It cannot dominate the souls of men very long because man inevitably seeks a higher being. The religious and freedom-loving peoples of the world are slowly but surely lining up solidly against Russia for a showdown. But the number of us, both as individuals and as nations, who will be living to enjoy freedom again, is in direct proportion to the speed, vigor, and intelligence with which we tackle this task together.

The freedom of America was not easily won and it will not be easily defended. The safest course, Mr. Speaker, is bold, common-sense action. I submit the following programs for immediate consideration and urge their inclusion in our emergency policies:

First. Bring in top leadership for Government service and set up a permanent advisory commission to the President, on foreign affairs.

Second. Initiate a full-scale debate in the House of Representatives on foreign policy, adopting programs that have the backing of our people which is so necessary for success.

Third. Mobilize all industry; catalog every citizen according to his capabilities for emergency national service; step up production; work to keep production lines rolling.

Fourth. Stop publicity and leaks of secret military information which have caused unnecessary loss of lives.

Fifth. Concentrate on the improvement of our military intelligence.

Sixth. Place a complete embargo on Russia, Red China, and Soviet-dominated countries. Put more pressure on all countries who are sending war materials to Russia to prevent future shipments.

Seventh. Enact a plan for the Government to finance the war on a pay-as-you-go basis in the fairest possible manner. Cut out unnecessary nonmilitary spending.

Eighth. Effect across-the-board controls, including price and wage controls, to stop run-away inflation which threatens to wreck our economy.

Ninth. Mobilize and fully train the necessary Armed Forces as quickly as possible, with particular emphasis on a permanent training program.

Tenth. Utilize the Japanese and Chinese Nationalists to the best possible advantage in the far-eastern war.

Eleventh. Speed up the mobilization of the army of Europe, pressing into service German, Spanish, French, and Yugoslavian troops.

Twelfth. Let Russia know we will use the atomic bomb when and where it will do the most good.

Thirteenth. Improve our counterspy and espionage system and make use of DP's in this connection as much as possible.

Fourteenth. Develop a strong civilian defense program.

Fifteenth. Take the initiative of world leadership away from atheistic Russia.

Sixteenth. Ask for divine guidance as our country is being called upon to lead the free world in the most crucial period of our history.

SENATE

(Legislative day of Monday, January 8, 1951)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Rev. F. Norman Van Brunt, associate minister, Foundry Methodist Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God and Father, in the abundance of Thy goodness another day is added to the record of life.

"Lord, for tomorrow and its needs we do not pray, Keep us, our God, just for today."

For a day which now possesses great prospects, set Thou a seal upon our lips that no fault or error might mar its record. Grant unto us the clear shining light of truth for our minds as we seek in Thy will the best for those whom we have been called to serve. May Thy servants make daily the choice of spiritual integrity above the corruption of the world, and have clarity of insight amid the confusion of the present hour. "Let Thy work appear unto Thy servants, and Thy glory unto their children. And let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us: and establish Thou the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands establish Thou it." In Thy name we pray. Amen.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"Assembly Joint Resolution 1

"Joint resolution relating to aid to our enemy

"Whereas through the medium of the American press, the people of America have had their attention directed to the fact that for many months immense quantities of rubber have been consigned to Soviet Russia, mainly from British Malaya, thence to the Chinese Red Government, and that some cargoes have even been transshipped from England under licenses of the Board of Trade, which is a section of the British Government; and

"Whereas these shipments are being made in the hours of our bleakest and blackest critical moments during our war in Asia with the full knowledge of the British Government, and especially at a time when natural rubber is becoming scarce and costly in America, and while we at this very moment are reactivating our synthetic rubber plants in order to stockpile for national defense; and

"Whereas recognition of the Chinese Red Government by any nation currently a member of the United Nations, in supplying war materials to our foes, either directly or indirectly, is a betrayal of America, which on all other occasions has made the sacrifice of life, limb, and property to make this world a peaceful place in which to live; and

"Whereas while over 50,000 members of our Armed Forces are already listed out of Washington as being casualties of this dreadful aggression in North Korea, we find that Great Britain, although a member of the United Nations, is still supplying rubber to the ruthless enemy which, given the opportunity, would take over their country in the same manner that they have already succeeded in conquering and taking over other small nations: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California (joint), That the Legislature of the State of California hereby respectfully memorializes President Truman and the Congress of the United States to petition the British Government to refrain from supplying rubber to the Chinese Red Government, and also petitions the United Nations to go on record to refrain from giving aid of any nature whatsoever to the Chinese Red Government, or to any nation which supplies help to the Chinese Red Government; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of these United States, Harry S. Truman, to the United States Senate, to the House of Representatives, and to the chairman of the congressional delegation from California."

A letter in the nature of a petition from the National Milk Producers Federation, Washington, D. C., signed by Charles W. Holman, secretary, enclosing a pamphlet entitled "A Dairy Policy, 1951" (with an accompanying pamphlet); to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

A resolution adopted by the Advisory Council to the Employment Security Commission of Wyoming, at Casper, Wyo., relating to the earmarking of all moneys collected under the Federal Unemployment Tax Act for use as funds for Federal and State costs of administering the employment security program; to the Committee on Finance.

A resolution adopted by the Board of Aldermen of the city of Somerville, Mass., favoring the granting of citizenship to alien mothers and fathers of sons who lost their lives in the Armed Forces of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. JENNER:

A concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Indiana; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"House Concurrent Resolution 2

"Whereas it has long been apparent that the fighting in Korea is and has been far more serious and consequential than any mere police action; and

"Whereas American forces are being murdered daily by the combined armies of Asiatic communism; and

"Whereas the United Nations, although it embarked in this momentous action as a collective action, continues to hesitate regarding sufficient measures for conclusive success in Korea and refuses to declare Communist China an aggressor in Korea: be it

"Resolved by the Eighty-seventh Indiana General Assembly, That we unmistakably assert that we oppose any further delay in bringing about a showdown in the United Nations;

"That we call on the delegates of the United States at the United Nations to obtain immediate and unequivocal condemnation by the United Nations of all aggressors in the Far East or else resign;

"That our State Department demand of the other members of the United Nations that they send to Korea immediately sufficient ground forces to enable American troops now there to continue the fighting there or else that we evacuate our men from Korea;

"That the President and the Congress of the United States proceed to enforce a military and economic blockade of Communist China;

"That the President and the Congress of the United States announce and enforce a military defense of Formosa;

"That the President and the Congress of the United States proceed to support with adequate arms and with dollars military opposition by the Chinese Nationalist Government against the Chinese Communist revolutionists;

"That the President and the Congress of the United States proceed immediately to assist in the arming of Japan and accept Japanese help in the common and combined opposition to Communist aggression in the Far East; and

"That the President and the Congress of the United States immediately shut off all further military and economic aid to any nation which indulges in traitorous trading with Communist Russia and with the satellites of Communist Russia; be it further

"Resolved, That it is the considered and unqualified recommendation of the Eighty-seventh Indiana General Assembly that the President and the Congress of the United States should enforce a vigorous and conclusive policy or "all out or get out" in Korea, and that this Nation obtain from the other members of the United Nations effective support of all collective action against Communist aggressors or else develop and initiate its own national program of home security and assistance for those threatened or attacked by aggressors."

WITHDRAWAL OF TROOPS FROM KOREA—RESOLUTION OF NORTH DAKOTA SENATE

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the body of the RECORD as part of my remarks a resolution adopted by the North Dakota Senate calling upon Congress and the President to withdraw our troops from Korea, develop a strong home defense and unify American views on foreign policy.

The resolution was received, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Resolution 1

Resolution calling upon Congress and the President to withdraw our troops from Korea, develop a strong home defense, and unify American views on foreign policy

Be it Resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota, That the Congress and the President of the United States are respectfully urged to take immediate action for the following purposes:

1. To withdraw all troops and military personnel from Korea;

2. To recognize the principle that no political or military commitment with respect to foreign policy that may involve the lives of Americans is binding upon the people of the United States unless it is first approved by the Congress;

3. To strengthen our continental defenses and prepare for effective action when the safety of our Nation is imperiled;

4. To provide leadership on foreign policy in which the people may have the utmost confidence; and

5. To provide the people of the United States with realistic information so that public opinion may crystallize in the form of a unified and unselfish foreign policy that history will applaud.

6. To disassociate ourselves from the Korean policy, a policy which has brought to our youth the tragedies of war without a candid recognition of the existence of a state of war, a policy which has made us the policeman of the United Nations without the United Nations assuming full responsibility for the eventualities of police action, a policy which risks war without first determining whether the objects sought are worth the risk, or a willingness to accept the risk when encountered.

That a copy of this resolution be signed by the president and secretary of the senate and sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, and to each Congressman and Senator from North Dakota.

RAY SCHNELL,
President of the Senate.
W. J. TROUT,
Secretary of the Senate.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY—RESOLUTION OF STOCKHOLDERS' MEETING OF FARMERS UNION GRAIN TERMINAL ASSOCIATION, ST. PAUL, MINN.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a resolution adopted at the thirteenth annual stockholders' meeting of the Farmers Union Grain Terminal Association, St. Paul, Minn., favoring the development of the St. Lawrence waterway.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution 3

Resolution on St. Lawrence waterway

We believe that the Nation would be far ahead in meeting the present emergency if the St. Lawrence waterway had been made reality, as was possible, many years ago. We continue strongly to favor this development as being in the interest of the whole Nation. We urge that the administration and Congress put new energy behind this project to hasten its realization.

We continue to favor regional development along the lines of TVA, to insure full use of resources. A Missouri Valley Authority is long overdue. Recent blunders in Pick-Sloan procedure illustrate the point.

We also favor the expansion of barge line transportation on the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers.

These developments are justified, whether we shall enjoy peace or are forced to mobilize.

WORLD PEACE—LETTER AND STATEMENT OF EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF NATIONAL CATHOLIC RURAL LIFE CONFERENCE, MILWAUKEE, WIS.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have in my hand a letter received from Msgr. Luigi Ligutti of the National Catholic Rural Life Conference, conveying to me a statement adopted by the executive committee of that distinguished organization at a recent meeting held in Milwaukee. The statement pertains to specific ways and means of promoting world peace by removing causes of social injustice and economic disorders. I know that the statement will be of interest to my colleagues. I know, too, that all groups in our population, particularly farmers, realize how vital will be the role of food in trying to prevent world war III by removing hunger, malnutrition, and so forth.

I present for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent that the text of Monsignor Ligutti's letter be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD to be followed thereafter by the text of the statement of the executive committee.

There being no objection, the letter and statement were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL CATHOLIC RURAL LIFE CONFERENCE,
Des Moines, Iowa, January 19, 1951.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
United States Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am enclosing herewith copy of official statement issued recently by the National Catholic Rural Life Conference at the executive committee meeting held in Milwaukee, Wis. The committee felt that it would be of interest to you as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The following Catholic bishops are members of our executive committee, were present and collaborated in the formulation of the statement: The Most Rev. A. R. Zuroweste, D. D., bishop of Belleville, Ill.; the Most Rev. William T. Mulloy, D. D., bishop of Covington, Ky.; the Most Rev. J. H. Schlarman, D. D., bishop of Peoria, Ill.; and the Most Rev. Vincent J. Ryan, D. D., bishop of Bismarck, N. Dak.

The committee felt that it was expressing not only the prevalent sentiment of the Catholic Church in the United States, but of the Catholic Church throughout the world.

We commend the statement to your thoughtful consideration.

With every good wish and the deepest sentiments of esteem, I beg to remain,

Very truly yours,

L. G. LIGUTTI,
Executive Director.

STATEMENT FORMULATED AND APPROVED AT THE SEMIANNUAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE MEETING OF THE NATIONAL CATHOLIC RURAL LIFE CONFERENCE, HELD IN MILWAUKEE, WIS., JANUARY 9–10, 1951

Christian men have a duty in conscience to help their neighbor in grave need so far as they are able without serious harm to themselves. Duties which individuals cannot perform devolve upon nations and international bodies. It is important that the obligation be not lost sight of at a time of crisis when we in this country are naturally concerned about our own safety and defense. Both morally and strategically our position becomes weaker if we abandon aid to world neighbors while still in a position to help them economically or otherwise.

Russian communism is a political and military force attempting to bring all freemen under its domination. But it is also a social and ideological force which seeks to convert men to a way of life alien to Christian and democratic tradition. It subverts nations and individuals by vain promises of security and improvement of their social and economic lot. In combating this world-power drive the United States must not trust in arms alone, but must do its utmost to improve the conditions of spiritual and material welfare of men everywhere still within the reach of our aid. To neglect assistance of this type would be to shirk our duty.

The foreign policy of the United States should aim at removing the causes of social injustice and economic disorder. It ought to do what is possible to help men help themselves to a better life, so that they will be happier individually, and as nations more ready to resist Communist promises and aggressions. Since the end of World War II our economic assistance has done much to preserve the freedom of Western Europe, which is the source of our culture and religious beliefs. That experience should be a lesson to us as we enter into a new period of resistance to aggression.

The misery, poverty, and social instability which are too prevalent in some parts of the world must be remedied to the best of our ability at the same time as we put arms in the hands of men to defend themselves against aggression. The United States must direct its economic assistance toward improvement of living conditions in Asia, the Near East, Africa, and Latin America. In social justice and Christian charity we must not neglect the needs of our world neighbors, especially at a time when this would decidedly weaken their ability and will to defend themselves.

Specifically we urge:

1. That the technical assistance program, both through the UN specialized agencies and bilaterally, be strengthened and expanded. Our dollars for peace must bear some proportion to our expenditures for defense.

2. That economic aid to western Europe be maintained to the extent necessary and be integrated into the defense program.

3. That in underdeveloped areas, where conditions of land tenure may be both unjust and unproductive, the little man be given a stake in land ownership and farm management. The United States should do what it can to promote legitimate and efficient capitalistic land reform programs.

4. That in the United States our own farmers put forth their best efforts to meet domestic and international food needs, within price levels consistent with the general level of living costs. A defense period should not become an occasion of profiteering on the part of any group, farmers included.

AID TO COUNTRIES IN COMMUNIST SPHERE OF INFLUENCE—RESOLUTION OF WOOD COUNTY (WIS.) BOARD OF SUPERVISORS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have received this morning from J. A. Schindler, county clerk of Wood County, Wis., a resolution adopted by the board of supervisors of that county in protest to the policy of the United States of giving aid to those countries which are still furnishing supplies to the Soviet area. I believe that the Wood County resolution expresses the views of countless Americans throughout our country because it is obvious that our American people will not tolerate the supplying of the very men who are killing American boys in Korea.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be appropriately referred and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution 19

Whereas certain nations receiving aid and assistance from the United States of America, have transferred and furnished to countries under the Communist sphere of influence materials which may and have been used in warfare; and

Whereas certain countries under the Communist sphere of influence are now engaged in open warfare against the forces of the United Nations; and

Whereas the youth of the United States in the forces of the United Nations are engaged in mortal combat in the battlegrounds of Asia against the armies of certain countries under the Communist sphere of influence: Be it

Resolved, That the Board of Supervisors of Wood County, Wis., in regular session assembled go on record in protest to the policy of the United States of America in giving aid to foreign nations, which are furnishing countries under the Communist sphere of influence, materials which may be used directly or indirectly in the waging of warfare; and be it further

Resolved, That the county clerk of the county of Wood, Wis., be instructed to send a copy of this resolution to the Honorable Alexander Wiley and Hon. Joseph McCarthy, United States Senators; Hon. Reid F. Murray, Representative of the Seventh Congressional District of Wisconsin; Hon. Melvin R. Laird, Jr., State senator; Hon. W. W. Clark, member of the assembly; the Wisconsin County Boards Association; and the clerks of the various counties of the State of Wisconsin.

THE KOREAN SITUATION—LETTER FROM R. A. MARTINSON—PETITION

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, many of my constituents are wrought up and terribly disturbed over our military reverses and heavy casualties in Korea. They are unable to understand our failure to use the atomic bomb and our other lethal weapons against the hordes who are annihilating our much smaller fighting forces in that very cold, very rough, and very distant land.

I agree with my Colorado folks that we should either give our men our full support or get them out of Korea.

Therefore, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred, a letter from R. A. Martinson, Jr., and the petition to the Government adopted by a mass meeting at Boulder, Colo., pleading for more support for our troops, signed by Mr. Martinson and 135 other citizens of Boulder, Denver, Littleton, Mitchell, Lafayette, Longmont, Eldorado Springs, and Berthoud, all in the State of Colorado.

There being no objection, the letter and petition were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, without all the signatures, as follows:

BOULDER, COLO., January 8, 1951.

Senator EDWIN JOHNSON,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We are enclosing copies of the Denver Post and Boulder Daily Camera concerning the meeting held here in Boulder by the Committee for Decision in Korea. Although the meeting was called on very short notice, a group of almost 200 persons responded and an overwhelming majority supported our program.

We are also enclosing a copy of the petition we are circulating with a typewritten list of names of those who signed the petition at the meeting.

We appreciated very much your appropriate remarks during the telephone call in which you participated, and wish to thank you for your cooperation.

If possible, we would like to have the petition embodied in a resolution and presented before the United States Senate.

Sincerely,

COMMITTEE FOR DECISION IN KOREA.
R. A. MARTINSON, Jr.

Senator, we have suggested to Senator EUGENE MILLIKIN and to Representative WILLIAM HILL that the petition be embodied in a resolution as suggested above. If it can be accomplished, we sincerely hope that you three will work as a group to draw up the resolution.

PETITION

1. We, the undersigned, believe that an immediate decision must be made by our Government in the Korean situation.

2. We believe that our Government must either grant to our military leaders the authority to use every weapon and to strike the Chinese Communists at any target necessary to successfully carry out the Korean operation, or that all American troops in Korea should be withdrawn immediately.

3. We believe that the needless loss of life in this conflict which is due to our refusal to give complete support to our troops is morally wrong.

4. We believe that if there is a reason for the present policy of fighting in Korea with one hand tied behind our back, that the American people deserve to know that reason.

REUBEN A. MARTINSON, Jr.
(And 135 other citizens).

INCREASE IN LIMIT OF EXPENDITURES BY COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Mr. RUSSELL, from the Committee on Armed Services, to which was referred the resolution (S. TEMPORARY PERSONNEL FOR SELECT COMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. SPARKMAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 42), which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Resolved, That in performing the duties imposed upon it by Senate Resolution 58, agreed to February 20, 1950, the Select Committee on Small Business is authorized to employ on a temporary basis during the Eighty-second Congress such technical, clerical, and other assistance as it deems advisable. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $25,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

ASSIGNMENT OF GROUND TROOPS FOR SERVICE IN EUROPE

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a modification of Senate Resolution 8, and ask that it be read, and that it be printed.

The resolution (S. Res. 8), as modified, was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Resolved" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Foreign Relations are authorized and directed to meet jointly to consider and report recommendations on whether or not the Senate should declare it to be the sense of the Senate that no ground forces of the United States should be assigned to duty in the European area for the purposes of the North Atlantic Treaty pending the adoption of a policy with respect thereto by the Congress. Such report, which shall be approved by a majority of the combined membership of the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Foreign Relations, shall be limited to the subject matter of this resolution, shall not contain any recommendation on any matter which is not germane thereto or which is in substantial contravention thereof or any recommendation either approving or disapproving the assignment of ground forces of the United States to duty in the European area for the purposes of the North Atlantic Treaty, and shall be made on or before February 2, 1951."

REHABILITATION OF CERTAIN ALCOHOLICS—CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. MCCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the leaders on both sides. There was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary Senate bill 265, to provide for a grant to the Prisoners Relief Society for use in the rehabilitation of chronic alcoholics. It is the same as S. 692 of the Eighty-first Congress. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of the bill (S. 265) and that it be referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ADMISSIONS AND GRIEVANCES OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BAR ASSOCIATION—CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. MCCARRAN. Mr. President, Senate Resolution 15 speaks of the Committee on Admissions and Grievances of the United States District Court, but in fact refers to the Committee on Admissions and Grievances of the Bar Association of the District of Columbia. It has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It is our opinion that the committee should be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution and that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE MARCH OF DIMES CAMPAIGN—TRIBUTE BY MILFORD E. SHIELDS

[Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a tribute in verse to the March of Dimes campaign, written by Milford E. Shields, of Durango, Colo., which appears in the Appendix.]

MEMBERS OF BOARDS OF VISITORS TO COAST GUARD AND MERCHANT MARINE ACADEMIES

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I wish to announce that I have appointed the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER] members of the Board of Visitors to the United States Coast Guard Academy.

I have also appointed to the Board of Visitors to the United States Merchant Marine Academy the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM].

WORK ACCOMPLISHED BY JUDICIARY COMMITTEE DURING EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement coming from myself, as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, with reference to the work accomplished by that committee during the Eighty-first Congress itself. It gives not only the number of measures dealt with but also the percentage dealt with as regards those that came from both Houses of Congress.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] On Apr. 20, 1950, there was filed by the Committee on the Judiciary with the Senate, Rept. No. 1515, which is a comprehensive report of approximately 1,000 pages on the immigration and naturalization systems. The report was the result of an investigation and study authorized by the Senate and conducted over the course of approximately 2½ years.

PROPOSED DRAFTING OF 18-YEAR-OLD BOYS FOR MILITARY SERVICE—LETTER FROM M. J. HORSCH

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Prof. M. J. Horsch, of the West Virginia Institute of Technology, Montgomery, W. Va., written to me on the 2d day of January, relative to the proposal to draft 18-year-old boys.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WEST VIRGINIA INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY,
Montgomery, W. Va., January 2, 1951.

The Honorable MATTHEW M. NEELY.
The United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I believe that I voice the conviction of a great many thinking Americans when I say that I trust that when Congress finally reaches the point where it deems the emergency so acute as to force upon immature 18-year-olds the moral shock of combat training and combat, it will first have forced upon us—every one of us—an equivalent sacrifice. To permit business as usual, profits as usual, wages as usual, working hours as usual, luxuries as usual, riotous living, and all the rest of our current souped-up ways of life as usual—and at the same time risk the destruction of the moral fiber of our 18-year-olds by exposing them, en masse, to a shock to which they have not the maturity to adjust themselves—would be a travesty upon American democracy.

When it becomes necessary, then let it come; but let us not call it necessary in the face of what is currently asked of the rest of us.

Whoever contemplates coming out of the present emergency one nickel richer than when entering—whether corporation, worker, management, merchant, or professional man—either doesn't understand the situation confronting us or doesn't deserve to be called American. Let's keep our values straight, and put priorities where they belong.

Respectfully,

M. J. HORSCH.

A SOLDIER'S VIEW OF THE KOREAN SITUATION

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the body of the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a clipping from the Walsh County Record of January 15, 1951, entitled "A Soldier's View."

I am sure that every Member of Congress will be as interested and concerned as I am about the observations of this combat officer, direct from the battlefields of Korea. His observations are very similar to those contained in all of my mail from servicemen, and is the best evidence I know as to why we should get out of Korea.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A SOLDIER'S VIEW

From time to time, as the bad news from Korea fills the newspapers and air waves, the question of our foreign policy—or the lack of it—comes up for discussion.

Most of the comments, however, come from the armchair generals at home. It is interesting, therefore, to gain the impression of a soldier who has been right in the middle of things. Sgt. Joe Kouba, Grafton, who is now stationed at Fort Lewis, Wash., forwarded to this newspaper the views of such a man. The writer of the letter is a divisional headquarters commander stationed in Korea. His letter was apparently written during a lull in operations. A part of it follows in the next few paragraphs:

"A soldier finds much relief from boredom in action—even dangerous action. It's not a very good thing to say, but actually everyone's thoughts are directed toward getting home. We are setting ourselves up for a good clobbering by thinking that way, but I guess it can't be helped.

"All the fine words being spoken back home about this 'gallant' cause we are fighting for no longer makes much of an impression on these boys. Oh, I guess when the chips are down we will fight hard enough, but it won't be fighting for the good of the world primarily. Under such conditions and such state of morale a man fights to save his fanny and don't ever let anyone tell you any differently. That means that we won't do our best fighting until our fannies are in danger of being lopped off from the rest of us. The incentive to fight, which makes the difference between a good or bad showing, is just not here. We don't have it.

"You look at these miserable, beaten little people and you can't help but wonder what possible good you can bring to them by making ruins of their hovels and tearing up their land trying to whip a monster 20 times your size. And no amount of fine talk about principles and freedom and liberation from evil can possibly make an impression on you. The world-toppling mistakes our foreign policy makers made in this part of the world are not going to be rectified in Korea and we might as well resign ourselves to that fact.

"Our only chance of survival against communism is to get out of this involvement, go back home and start building our armed might like mad for the showdown with Russia, the core of the whole rotten menace, which is bound to come. That is not only my opinion, that is the opinion of every clear and realistic thinking person over here. That is why I say we are not prepared, mentally, for a showdown fight with Russia's stooge, China. And that is why we stand in a fair way of being knocked stiff if we are called upon to make a stand here. We just are not in this business wholeheartedly and an army without willingness to stand by its convictions is lost.

"No one has to tell me that the cause is a worthy one. God knows I will gladly give my life to know that you can live in a world of peace. Every man over here would be willing to make that sacrifice. I can't help believe that the sacrifice of our field army at this time would be worthless. Let's face it. There's a h—— of a lot of Chinks in this part of the world and they don't like us."

Not a very pretty picture, is it?

STATEMENT BY MAJ. GEN. ROBERT H. SOULE

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an article which appeared in the Baltimore Sun of this morning quoting Maj. Gen. Robert H. Soule, who is the commander of the United States Third Division in Korea, and who was formerly United States attaché to China. He, as Senators may recall, was held as a virtual prisoner of the Communists for 6 months before being permitted to leave. The general tenor of his article is that the UN Army can hold the Chinese. It is refreshing, in view of the faint hearts at Lake Success, to find someone showing some intestinal fortitude.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENERAL SAYS UN ARMY CAN HALT CHINESE—THIRD DIVISION'S COMMANDER DECLARES ALLIES CAN HOLD OR ADVANCE

WESTERN FRONT, KOREA, January 21 (AP).—Maj. Gen. Robert H. Soule, fighting front line commander (of the United States Third Division), said today:

"We can stop the Chinese on this line or any other line they tell us to hold.

"And if they order us," the Wyoming-born general added, "we will go back and take Seoul. We can stop any damn thing they can throw at us."

Soule knows his Chinese. He was military attaché of the United States Embassy to the Nationalist Chinese Government from 1946 to 1950.

HELD FOR 6 MONTHS

He also had a chance to learn Red Chinese fighting methods. The Communists kept him under house arrest for 6 months—until he returned to America last June, just before the Korean war started.

The general granted that the Chinese have overwhelming numbers. But he said the United Nations force, with its superior weapons, can defeat even the cream of the Chinese Red army, which he estimates at 500,000, and he said the "cream" already has been committed to the battle.

"We have hurt his best troops in many spots," said Soule. "Behind them is the riffraff."

SUPPLY LINES CALLED WEAK

"The Chinese are weak on maintaining supply lines, and very few of their top commanders understand modern warfare. They have few planes and little artillery, and they don't know how to use them as well as we do. All they have is hordes," he added with a grin. "And how many hordes are there in a battalion?"

The general urged optimistic thinking and good propaganda.

"We need to get over this awe of numbers," he said, "and get used to the idea that we can whip them, because we can."

"Not only can we beat them militarily, but we can lick them politically as well, if we get a good propaganda program started.

"They're sick of communism in China already. The Reds offered them land, and many Chinese believed it and sent their sons to fight for the Communists.

"They got the land, all right, but each man got such a small portion he wasn't even able to feed his family—and then the Government took half of his crop away to feed the army.

"The Chinese now know they made a bad bargain. If we can get across these facts of how communism really operates to the rest of the people of the Far East, we can defeat the Reds in a war of ideas just as we can lick them in the military battle.

"WHAT TO TELL THE PEOPLE

"We should tell the people of Asia that half of everything produced in Manchuria and Mongolia goes straight to Russia. We should tell them that thousands are starving, and that the Russians are letting them starve because they believe China has too many people to live off the land.

"We should tell them that Mao (Red Chairman Mao Tse-tung) has sold out China to Russia. When other peoples know these things, they won't be so anxious to embrace communism.

"Look at all the refugees coming away from the Reds here in Korea," Soule continued. "These people have seen communism, and they don't like it. They'd rather starve than stay in the north under the Reds.

"Meanwhile, if we are told to stand and fight, we can hold here or any place, or we can go forward," the general concluded.

FORMOSA AND MILITARY AID FOR CHIANG KAI-SHEK

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, on Wednesday, January 17, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS] delivered a very interesting address on the subject of our foreign policy. In the course of his address he engaged in exchange of questions and answers with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN] on the question of Formosa and the so-called neutrality of Formosa.

I find in the New York Herald Tribune of Friday, January 19, a very interesting and enlightening editorial entitled "Formosa and Chiang," and in the same issue of the New York Herald Tribune an article by the correspondent Miss Marguerite Higgins, from Taipei, Formosa, entitled "Military Aid for Chiang Kai-shek."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these two items, the editorial and the article in the New York Herald Tribune of Friday, January 19, be incorporated in the body of the RECORD as an important contribution to the discussion of our foreign policy as it is being carried on at the present time.

There being no objection, the editorial and the article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORMOSA AND CHIANG

The collapse of the latest effort to attain a cease-fire in Korea has demonstrated to all who still needed to be convinced that Red China will continue to wage war on the peninsula until its forces have either been fought to a standstill or have achieved their objectives. In addition to the conquest of Korea, these goals involve the seating of Mao's men in the United Nations and the withdrawal of the American Navy from the waters around Formosa—in other words, a free hand for the Reds to attack the last Chinese Nationalist stronghold.

The United States has officially stated that Formosa is to be neutralized so long as the Korean situation threatens the peace of the Far East and the island's status is then to be settled by international agreement. Therefore, while Red China insists on reversing this order, using its armed forces to blackmail the UN into a settlement of the Formosa problem which is favorable to itself, the United States is under no diplomatic obligation to elaborate its position concerning the island. It cannot offer to trade the Nationalists of Formosa for some agreement with Mao over Korea. That would be immoral and foolish in the extreme. The Communist aggression in Korea is an offense in itself, one which must be atoned for, or at the very least, ended, before there can be any discussion of other Asiatic issues.

If Formosa is one of the goals which Mao is striving to attain through his attack in Korea, it also has great importance for the free nations of Asia. In the hands of the Communists, it is a grave threat; in the hands of a government independent of Communist control, it offers a hope that China may be regained for freedom. Elsewhere on this page, Miss Marguerite Higgins discusses the reasoning of American officials on the island, who admit the past mistakes of the Kuomintang, but who are confident that the reforms which have been introduced since the retreat to Formosa as well as the vast disillusionment with communism which has swept over the Chinese mainland make a favorable atmosphere for positive support of Chiang Kai-shek.

Chiang and his army on Formosa are facts. They cannot be ignored nor can the 6,000,000 Formosans be sold down the Yangtse. What, then, should be the role of Chiang's forces in the present crisis? It is obvious that they cannot simply be turned loose on the mainland, as some Americans suggest, in the hope that this would somehow enable the United States to fight a continental war without using American troops. Chiang's return to China under American auspices would constitute a very heavy commitment in Asia, which would have to be studied as carefully by American strategists as if United States divisions were going ashore in the first wave. This country could not wash its hands of Chiang, if, by any chance, he suffered a defeat in such circumstances.

In any case, the Nationalists still need arms to make Formosa secure. This is America's first responsibility toward the island and its defenders. The mere existence of the Nationalist Government on Formosa is a beacon light to the growing anti-Communist groups within China, which must not be put out by appeasement, by Red invasion, or by a premature military adventure from Formosa. The United States has no territorial designs on Formosa nor any desire to expand the war in Asia. But before the many-fisted Communist thrust that threatens the world, it cannot see a spot of such high strategic and political importance as Formosa in Red hands. Neither—while Mao makes war on the UN and his Russian masters growl threats from Moscow—can it exclude the possibility of encouraging the Nationalists to strike for their own freedom whenever and wherever it is militarily feasible.

MILITARY AID FOR CHIANG KAI-SHEK—WHY AMERICAN OFFICIALS IN FAR EAST BELIEVE IN CONDITIONAL HELP FOR GENERALISSIMO

(By Marguerite Higgins)

TAIPEI, FORMOSA.—Conditions in the Far East have changed to the point where immediate and extensive military aid for Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek is now necessary. But America should take this step only if prepared to expend sufficient time and personnel to control this aid and thus hold out hope for a new deal for China.

These are the views of America's top economic, diplomatic, and military officials on this disputed and strategic island 100 miles off the Chinese mainland. Far-eastern experts here have warned Washington that Chiang's 500,000 troops hold out the only realistic hope of preventing Communist conquest of all Asia.

American officials have asked themselves this question: Despite the errors of the past, could aid to Chiang Kai-shek be managed in the future so as to advance the cause of the non-Communist world? The answer is: Yes—on condition that this aid is handled in the right manner.

These conclusions have not been lightly arrrived at. Many of the top men here have been in China more than 25 years. They were on hand in the days of the Kuomintang's (Nationalist Party's) disintegration on the mainland. It is important, in this writer's opinion, that some of the people who watched this disintegration take the lead in arguing that both the Chiang regime and America have learned from the past and that, therefore, there is hope for the future—if help arrives in time.

The blunt truth—and this is no secret from the Communists—is that without American help Chiang could not hold out for any long period against a Soviet-supplied Chinese Communist assault on Formosa. The Nationalist troops might put up a whale of a fight for a time, but eventually they would be defeated because, among other reasons, they would run out of ammunition. The shortage of ammunition and other vital supplies on Formosa is one of the bases for the increasingly urgent messages to Washington urging that a decision be reached soon about help for this island.

A high American official told me: "It is my personal view that we have about 2 months' grace in which to make up our minds. Unless supplies start pouring in some time in this period I think Formosa's obvious weakness will be such as to tempt the Communists to attack, especially if the Seventh Fleet is occupied elsewhere [meaning Korea]."

Here are some of the reasons why American officials in the Far East believe Chiang should be supported militarily and, when possible, helped to stage a second front against the Chinese Communists on the mainland:

1. Whereas a year ago the mainland Chinese were indifferent toward the Nationalists, Chiang's troops would now be welcomed by many, including guerrillas who would actively flock to his support. Previous indifference was partly due to the fact that the nature of Chinese communism was not any more clear to the average Chinese than to the average American. The Reds themselves have clarified matters. Their stringent economic and political tactics are drawing ever closer to the pattern of the Soviet police state. The new Red terrorism, exemplified by widespread arrests, especially of the middle class, has turned millions of once-neutral Chinese into enemies of the Communists. The popular misconception of the Chinese Communists as mild agrarian reformers is one reason why resistance to Mao Tse-tung's revolutionary army was so weak, veteran observers say. This does not excuse the corruption and inefficiency of the Nationalists. But the Nationalists, in seeking to restore order to their war-torn country, were not helped any, either, by our vacillating policy toward the Red regime, these officials state.

2. Before the Chinese Reds began warring on the United Nations there were sound reasons for holding back aid to Chiang, lest this prove a provocation. But despite neutralization of Formosa, the Reds attacked anyway. Thus, there is no further reason against using the invaluable reservoir of trained manpower afforded by Chiang's forces.

3. Chinese dictator Mao Tse-tung has announced on the Peking radio that it is his purpose to liberate all of Asia, even as he is now liberating Korea. Although the free world traditionally refuses to believe the words of dictators when the meaning is unpleasant, it is the view of the China experts that Mao means what he says. For tactical reasons the Reds may retrench and there may be a halt of several years in their expansion. But the liberation will never be abandoned. The lesson of Korea is that the Reds will strike whenever they feel their power sufficient to insure victory. If we give in to aggression anywhere in Asia, the Communists will thereby be strengthened and their increased strength will encourage them to strike again. That is why it is better, in the opinion of officials here, to recognize that the Chinese have started a war against us and to retaliate in every way available.

Officials who have watched Chiang in operation on Formosa for the past year believe there is a reasonable chance that the Kuomintang of tomorrow can be better than the Kuomintang of yesterday. These officials state that Chiang has not only announced his willingness, but his desire that future aid be regulated by American technicians and advisers. In this way the Americans, in a sense, would share the responsibility for what happens in the future. It is believed that if diplomatic means are used, Chiang wou'd be amenable to many reforms asked by the Americans.

It is felt that in the past some American representatives in China, notably the late Gen. Joseph W. Stilwell, had the highest ideals but got the Kuomintang's back up by using what are bluntly referred to as hammer-on-the-head methods. America's present representative in Formosa, Minister Karl L. Rankin, an able, hard-working diplomat, is just the person, if given authority, to promote a policy of friendly firmness toward the Kuomintang, officials here think.

On the encouraging side is the fact that in the past year Chiang's officials have been completely cooperative with the Economic Cooperation Administration mission. They have followed through, for example, on suggestions for tax and land reform. The ECA has poured some $33,000,000 worth of aid into Formosa since June 1950 and is currently programing an investment of about $50,000,000 a year. This investment would have to be increased if sufficient equipment were provided to give Chiang a first-class fighting machine, including a substantial air force and navy.

At the moment, the Formosa Government is beset by gold crises, but, otherwise, it has achieved considerable stability, ECA officials say. A rational system of taxation has been introduced for the first time, power plants and fertilizer plants are under construction, the price of rice has been held down and fertilizer provided by ECA grants has been used to push rice production far above the record set by the Japanese.

Also on the plus side are the Kuomintang's elections establishing self-government on the communal level. The Formosan elections are to be followed by general elections on this island, which was returned to China in 1945 after many years of occupation by the Japanese. The Japanese used it as one of their main war bases.

Chiang's army is undergoing intensive training. The soldiers seem in good physical condition. But no one can predict with certainty how they will perform in combat. One way of finding out is to accept Chiang's offer to send 33,000 troops to the Korean front.

On the discouraging side is the continuing tendency in the Kuomintang to use the old divide-and-rule system. A number of Chinese generals have recently been kicked upstairs and the American observers feel they would be better in their old jobs. The generals were promoted, it is reported because Chiang was not sure of their loyalty to him.

Americans have no authority to even speak out in these matters at the moment. But should we grant extensive aid our views would be an important factor officials say.

Another sore point in Formosa is Chiang's secret police. The Kuomintang insists that the police are essential to curbing communism. The opposition states that the police are used to quell any one against the government. Chiang's regime clearly has a considerable way to go before the rule of law and not of men is established. This correspondent has been in six police states, including North Korea. It is my view that Chiang has a long way to go before he can be lumped in the same category as the Communist regimes.

In summing up, an important official here stated: "There are many risks in the battle against communism. Despite the risks we must not cease trying. When I look around the world at the people willing to fight on our side I say that Chiang is a better risk than most."

THE SWORD OF THE SPIRIT

Mr. McMAHON. I rise in the Senate this afternoon to speak for the dictates of conscience—not alone for my own conscience, but in such measure as I may for the conscience of my country. I see blunt truths that need to be said. If they are left unsaid, they may remain buried until the wreckage of our civilization closes over them.

The issue before this Congress is survival.

The deliberations now occupying the Senate are being called the great debate—a term at once both apt and misleading. Great questions are assuredly being considered, and our discussions take place at a time of the greatest peril our Nation has even known. But this does not mean that great differences of opinion divide the Members of this body. This Senate includes neither men of craven instincts nor warmongers.

Free men know this—they will understand and appreciate our discussions. In this searching of our consciences, in this scrutiny of the fundamentals of our international conduct, free men will see underscored our abiding belief in the wisdom of frank and open debate. They will take heart from watching a great Nation charting its future course by reasoned discourse and persuasion.

Yet there are dangers in this debate, and we must not minimize them. In the eyes of rulers of slave states, debate means division of purpose; honest differences of opinion betoken weakness, instead of strength; dissent spells disloyalty.

I think it imperative that we set the record straight on this point—history will not be indulgent if we do less. Our bearing and demeanor must make amply clear what is in fact true—that this Senate unanimously desires to defend the United States with every power at its command, that this Senate unanimously desires to bring all the world's peoples a just and lasting peace.

We must set the record straight on another point. These walls properly resound with demands for increasing America's material strength — the strength of tanks, ships, planes, and atomic bombs. Such demands are fully justified; we must generate military might. I shall, of course, vigorously support—as I have unswervingly supported in the past—every item of legislation which enhances our armed power.

Yet this Senate must not make the world think that America is reaching for the sword of steel as though it alone will save her. Our actions must positively demonstrate that we regard our moral position in the world as of transcendent importance—as our strongest line of defense. I believe that the massive danger now confronting our Nation stems primarily from our failure to recognize the sword of the spirit as the only absolute weapon.

No sensible man will dispute the magnitude of our peril. Present-day Russia already controls one-third of the world. She is already at the summit which Hitler and Tojo reached only after a long chain of conquests. The men in the Kremlin are stockpiling atomic weapons; and we must presume that they are working on the development of hydrogen bombs as well. Their expanding air force includes long-range bombers; their fleet contains submarines potentially capable of launching guided missiles against our shores.

We find ourselves locked with the masters of Russia in an accelerating armaments competition. A year ago, when many members of this body worked toward the altogether desirable goal of balancing the budget, I ventured to predict that our military expenditures would mock at such hopes—that they would force our budget up and up and up. I predicted also that the regimentation necessarily accompanying the nation-in-arms would force our freedoms down and down and down.

Today we face a military budget of $70,000,000,000—and even this sum will prove sadly inadequate if the arms race rushes onward. We confront the grim prospect of price controls, allocations, rationing, increased requirements for military service—and a thousand and one other growing encroachments upon our cherished liberties.

We are building our defenses against the Soviet armies and against their atomic weapons.

Yet one supreme danger we are largely ignoring. Without firing a single shot, the Soviet Union is depriving us of our weapon prized above all others—our reputation as a nation ardently desiring peace with justice. Without sending into battle a single Russian soldier, the Kremlin threatens to win the truly decisive battle—the struggle for the minds and souls of men. Without engaging a solitary Red division, the Soviets may destroy America's moral position before the free world.

We have taken a severe propaganda beating from the Communists over the past several years, both in Europe and the Orient. The Communists have done an excellent job of selling the idea that the United States is war-minded and seeks conquest.

They have tagged America with the epithet "warmonger" and sold it to an alarming extent. While this fraudulent campaign has been going on, they have maintained their internal strength through the Iron Curtain.

The tremendous power of the Soviet conspiracy throughout the world today is due in large part to the Iron Curtain. This barrier against truth may be the Soviet's strongest weapon. But I am convinced that if we focus world opinion on the Iron Curtain and expose it as a fraud and a menace to world peace, we may convert this barrier against truth into a Soviet liability.

Perhaps we cannot convince the Kremlin rulers to open up the curtain, but I am absolutely certain that we can cripple and perhaps silence the Soviet propaganda guns in the Western world. People can see through a fraud very easily when it is exposed to them.

I suggest we have a moral duty and a right to talk to the Russian people and the Senate of the United States is the proper body to express that right. If the Soviet government refuses to permit its people to listen, then the world will know that the Soviet leaders fear the Russian people more than they fear us.

Every observer who returns from overseas describes the profound and ominous skepticism concerning America's intentions in the world. In Western Europe—the nurturing place of the doctrines that undergird our conduct as a religious nation—countless people profane their fathers' beliefs and incline toward Godless Communism. Others, who should be combating the onrush of Red power with all their minds and hearts, are faint-hearted in their resistance. Still others seek refuge in indifference; they aspire toward ethical and political neutralism. In the Far East—where the populations experiencing rebirth should cherish our historic support of national self-determination—leaders instead take their bearings from Moscow, the arch enemy of every state which presumes to remain sovereign.

It is deeply paradoxical that matters should be thus. The truth is that our conduct during these past five years need give none of us cause for apology. It has been marked by great valor and fortitude and by unparalleled generosity. We have exerted immense physical labors to reinvigorate a war-torn world—and these great physical exertions have been complemented by heartfelt adherence to principles no less great.

This is the country that has wisely strengthened potential victims of aggression through the North Atlantic Pact and military aid program. This is the country whose stockpile of atomic weapons, together with the Marshall Plan, has kept the Red armies from marching to the English Channel and enslaving all Europe.

This is the same country that has succored millions with the Marshall Plan—that mighty expression of our historic willingness to help other peoples work their way toward self-respect and self-support. This is the same country that offered to share all that is good in atomic energy, and asked in return only those safeguards which would keep the evil in the atom from being used to destroy us. This is the same country that has instituted the Point Four program to relieve crushing poverty and disease in the under-developed areas of the world. This is the country which is bearing the chief burden of the fighting in Korea—not as an aggressor—but to sustain the principle of collective resistance of the United Nations of the world against imperialist aggression.

In good part, we have done these things to help ourselves. We know we cannot remain an island of prosperity amidst a world-wide slum. We recognize that our allies need the aid of our unrivaled resources if they are to become stalwart partners in successfully resisting our common foe. But we have also done these things because we are by nature and tradition a generous people—it is not like us to remain indifferent while others are denied the most elementary decencies of life.

Our noble efforts have yielded noble dividends. Western Europe, the decisive area of world politics, still remains in the camp of freedom. Our European friends have so far contained the threat from within. Protected by our shield of atomic weapons, they are building armies capable of emphatically answering a threat from without. But, above all, our accomplishments have won for us precious time—and the chance to dedicate ourselves afresh to forwarding those moral principles which alone bring dignity and meaning to man's existence.

I am proud to have supported all these great measures, and I am especially proud of the opportunity afforded me—as chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy—to help make our atomic stockpile the bulwark of the world's liberties.

During the same years that our nation has fought this good fight for freedom and decency, the Soviet Union has compiled its own record of achievements. It has extinguished the freedoms of 700,000,000 people. It has flatly rejected the international atomic control plan regarded as wise and just by all the free world. It has operated a reverse Marshall Plan—stripping its satellites of their industries and draining them of their resources.

Despite all this, untold millions still gravitate toward Moscow's cause—untold millions suspect us of aggressive imperialism and remain blind to the terrifying advance of Soviet power. Our country rearms solely for self-defense and with immeasurable reluctance—yet many truly believe that we are the warmongers. We give of our substance to help those ravaged by war and poverty—yet many still regard us as selfish and soulless materialists.

Why have so many put this topsy-turvy interpretation on our record? Why are the tides in the ideological conflict still running so strongly against us? Why are we losing ground in the battle for the allegiance of men?

Why have we failed?

Mr. President, I think we have failed because we have not sufficiently put first things first. We have failed because we have not completely rallied the moral and spiritual strength of the free world as a mighty force for peace.

We have rightfully worked at invigorating the free world's economic strength—but in the process many of us have forgotten that men's souls need filling no less than their stomachs. We have properly worked at reconstituting the free world's military strength—but in the meanwhile some of us have not realized that weapons are worthless unless the men behind them passionately believe in the rightness of their cause.

All our national history is proof that a fighting faith comes from more than the cold metal of armaments or the cement of factory walls. Some of us have nonetheless supposed that global situations of strength could be created solely with guns and goods. Too many, I fear, have overlooked what all military leaders hold axiomatic—that even cold military power ultimately rests upon morale, and that morale, in turn, rests upon a surety of conviction that one's cause is the cause of decent men. By failing to go all-out in augmenting the free world's moral strength, some of us have in practice denied what the darkest cynic concedes—that human beings are incorrigibly moral and that they will stand up for a cause only if convinced of its nobility and justice.

Our failure in this respect does not lie at the doorstep of any individual or any department of the Government. The Voice of America, let us never forget, merely transmits policy; it does not make it. If we lay down a moral program of splendid and compelling dimensions, the Voice will do its part. Our failure to proclaim such a program is a national failure. The Congress shares in the blame; there are no scapegoats; this is not the fault of the Republicans or the Democrats. It is a fault common to all of us.

I suggest that the root cause of our failing may have eluded us precisely because it is so simple. I suggest that our failure may be a failure to tell the world the obvious.

The obvious truths—the truths which, if universally accepted, could change the course of history—are these: First, that the supreme menace to world peace is not American war-mongering but the Soviet Iron Curtain. Second, that the United States does in fact have a positive program for achieving a just and lasting peace.

If these statements are true—and I am sure no one in this Senate will quarrel with them—why in heaven's name are we not proclaiming them with every means at our command? Why are we not now declaring these truths with such directness and power that nobody could mistake their meaning?

It is solely the Iron Curtain that keeps the people of Russia from knowing the true and desperate nature of the international crisis. It is solely this curtain that keeps them from learning how eagerly we wish to extend our hand in friendship. It is solely this curtain that enables the Kremlin to twist and distort any world happening to fit the party line. Save for the Iron Curtain, I am sure that ordinary Russians would invoke their wrath on rulers who deny them life's barest necessities and who saddle them with crushing armaments expenditures.

If this is the case—as certainly it is—why have we not asked the United Nations to act accordingly? I have strongly supported the United Nations—peace cannot be achieved without a functioning parliament of man. But the United Nations should be the town meeting of the world. Instead, it has served largely as a one-way channel for spreading Soviet propaganda. In the UN forums, the Russian spokesmen pour forth their invective and divide the free world. At the same time, they use their Iron Curtain to avoid an accounting to the Russian people.

It is high time that we ask the United Nations to state in forthright terms its right to have its deliberations made known behind the Iron Curtain. I believe that as a minimum the United Nations should assert its right to operate its own radio station in the Soviet Union. The right to know is a sacred human right, and we are moral shirkers if we refrain from saying so.

I am not naive enough to suppose that Stalin will rush to accept such a proposal. However, it is eminently just—and fair-minded men will realize this. We would ask only that the free peoples' views are circulated among the Russians—just as the Soviets' views are circulated among us. We would advance a legitimate request, and people would quickly grasp the significance of the Kremlin's refusal to honor it. Here is the one proposal to which no Communist could advance even a propaganda answer. Here is the one proposal which—if rejected—can glaringly expose the sham and duplicity of Mr. Vishinsky's utterances. Why, then, has the UN not already made such a request?

Before we charge the United Nations with sins of omission, however, let us examine our own record—let us be sure that we are ourselves straining to the utmost our ingenuity and exploring every conceivable approach in responding to the challenge of the Iron Curtain. I fear that we have much room for improvement on this score.

One example suffices. While our eyes were on Korea during this last summer we overlooked a tremendous Communist victory in Western Europe. I refer to the spurious peace movement that operated under the guise of the Stockholm petition. The campaign was disarmingly simple—and its real purpose was equally simple—to disarm the free world of the one thing that prevents all-out Soviet aggression—its atomic superiority. The petition asked that the nations agree not to use atomic weapons, and demanded that the first party to break this pledge be branded an aggressor. It cunningly ignored the fact that the real crime against world peace is international aggression—of the kind the Soviets have abetted in Korea. It carefully did not mention that only Soviet opposition has prevented world-wide adoption of a plan that would truly end the threat of atomic war by effectively regulating the manufacture of these weapons. It avoided saying what all of us know—that if we are ever forced to employ these weapons, it will only be in answer to Red aggression.

The Communist zealots spread this petition—of whose existence many of us were hardly aware, with their customary fervor. They requested signatures at union meetings; bicycle riders carried it to farmers; priests and ministers were asked to circulate it among their congregations.

Everyday Europeans, who had known five years of total war, flocked to sign this cunning document. Their hearts were open to anything—no matter how deceitful—that promised them peace. Is it any wonder that the Stockholm Appeal mightily strengthened the cause of European neutrality?

Once again, however, we must refrain from calling the kettle black. Our European friends, true, have been gullible. But are we sure that we have as yet offered them a satisfactory answer to the Communist peace campaign?

The Europeans have fought and heroically died for freedom—and they are willing to do it again. We should in turn fortify their resolve by a bold proclamation of those principles to which free men everywhere will pledge their all.

I think they have a right to expect from us a forthright declaration of where we stand.

I believe that this Senate should immediately undertake a ringing declaration of America's intentions. I believe that such a declaration would more than undo the disastrous effects of the Stockholm Appeal. I believe that it would find responsive hearers wherever men yearn for peace and security. I believe it would immeasurably strengthen us in our struggle with the few men who control Russia's destinies.

We are about to appropriate huge sums for our common defense. It is inevitable that we do this. In fact, I do not believe that our mobilization plans go fast enough or far enough. I stand—as I have always stood in the past—for all the tanks and planes and atomic weapons we need to frustrate Stalin's designs.

Nonetheless, the peoples of the earth, and the Russian people especially, must know why we are rearming. They must learn that we do this only with heavy heart; they must understand that we would prefer—far prefer—to use our skills and monies for human enrichment. They must understand that we will never close the door on peace—and that there is no malice in our hearts or in our actions.

I therefore propose that this Senate pass a resolution expressing friendship for the people of Russia by the people of the United States. I propose that we simultaneously ask the Soviet government to make this resolution known to the Russian people.

I further propose that if such a resolution is adopted, it be circulated in every American city and hamlet, and that it be signed by every American who would welcome the friendship of the people of Moscow and Odessa and Vladivostok.

You will not mistake my meaning. Not for an instant do I suggest that we embrace the men who run concentration camps, pervert truth, and withhold basic human rights from one-third of the world. As men of conscience, we cannot condone those frightful practices. But I am convinced that the rank and file Russians desire global conquest no more than we do. I am convinced that if they believe the calumnies of their government, it is only because they have not the slightest inkling of the kind of world we Americans really want.

The resolution might embody in plain language these plain truths:

1. That—despite what the Russian people have been told to the contrary—there are no warmongers in the United States Senate.

2. That there is not a member of the United States Senate who desires the death of a single Russian soldier or citizen.

3. That while we are resolutely determined to appropriate billions for defense, this Senate and the people of the United States ardently desire a just peace.

4. That the United States government stands ready at all times to compose its differences with the Soviet government through honorable negotiations.

5. That we ask the Soviet Government—which controls all sources of information within Russia—to publicize these facts in their newspapers and over their radio networks.

In no manner would this declaration constitute a hostile act. It is not a propaganda trick; it asks no more than the rights we accord to all other nations; it expresses a legitimate request; it is intended in good faith.

This manifesto would serve to do more than express our friendship for the Russian people. It would tell all the world—the French, the Italians, the Indians, the Chinese, the Egyptians, the Czechs, the Poles—that we Americans want a just peace with all our hearts, and that we arm only because our lives and honor are desperately imperiled.

Some will, of course, charge that the Kremlin would ignore such a resolution. But truth has a dynamic quality. I believe, in fact, that this resolution might dramatically change for the better the course of the ideological war, which now flows so strongly in the Soviets' favor.

But standing by itself, the resolution is insufficient. I regard it as altogether imperative that we so express our desire to live in friendship with all the world's peoples. But we must go even further. We must demonstrate that we are willing to do our share and more in bringing about such a fraternity of mankind—and that we have a program that can lead men toward the final enshrinement of human brotherhood.

Last October, President Truman set forth a program capable of achieving this mighty end. Speaking before the United Nations, in one of the greatest addresses known to American history, Mr. Truman defined the basic goals of our foreign policy.

He laid down what I like to call the two imperatives of peace—first, foolproof disarmament and, second, use of the money thus saved for human betterment.

If real disarmament were achieved—

Mr. Truman said—and I quote—the nations of the world, acting through the United Nations, could join in a greatly enlarged program of mutual aid. As the cost of maintaining armaments decreased, every nation could greatly increase its contributions to advancing human welfare. All of us could then pool even greater resources to support the United Nations in its war against want. In this way, our armaments would be transformed into foods, medicines, tools for use in underdeveloped areas, and into other aids for human advancement. * * * Thus we could give real meaning to the old promise that swords shall be beaten into plowshares, and that the nations shall not learn war any more.

Peace instead of war, bread instead of bombs, life instead of death—here is the terminus of our foreign policy, the end point of our strivings. "This is the goal," as our President put it, "which we must keep before us—and the vision in which we must never lose faith."

It is one of the tragedies of our time that we in the Congress have so far failed to act affirmatively for peace by putting ourselves four-square behind the ultimate foreign policy objectives the President announced before the United Nations. Why is this Congress not now proclaiming and raising on high these identical aims as the crux of our moral plan for peace? Why are we not now declaring, in no uncertain terms, that the official policy of the United States Congress rests upon the two imperatives of peace: foolproof control of weapons and use of the money saved for human betterment? Why are we still waiting to tell the world, "Here is our defense money—join us in a secure system to regulate all weapons and the money you save, along with the money we save, can be pooled through a common United Nations fund to buy bread and tractors"?

Such a proposal would say to the peoples of the East, passionately revolting against the Colonialism of the past two hundred years, that we sympathize with their aspirations for equality with the Western World.

The era of Colonialism is dead—let us recognize that, and welcome the new movement toward political and economic freedom which has taken its place.

Their needs are not only material but of the spirit, which seeks the freedom and the equality that for so many generations men of the West have denied to their brothers in the Orient—in India, in China, in Africa.

Here is a proposal which the peasant and the nomad will understand. Here is a proposal which might gather to itself such support that not all the opposition on earth could stop its march to fulfillment.

Early last February I pointed out that if a safe system of weapons control went into effect and if our military expenses were therefore reduced two-thirds, we would save some $50,000,000,000 over a period of five years. I suggested that we offer to take such a sum as this $50,000,000,000—once the control system were proved to be airtight—and use it for Point Four programs and technical assistance to backward areas and splitting the atom for peace.

Today, ten months later, we know that $50,000,000,000 will be spent—not in five years, but in less than one year: all for engines of war, none for engines of peace. And the end is not yet.

These stark facts were obvious last spring to those distinguished colleagues of both parties who joined me in sponsoring Senate Concurrent Resolution 94. Through that resolution, we asked that the Congress of the United States formally advocate and support the two imperatives of peace as the supreme moral goal of our nation's policy.

I believe that my cosponsors on Senate Concurrent Resolution 94 combine idealism with practical hard-headedness. The offer which we propose would not cost the United States one cent to make—and nothing but good could come from that offer. If it were rejected, the American people would lose nothing in material terms and they would gain in moral stature. If the offer were accepted, not one penny of the taxpayers' money would be spent that would not have been spent in any event—that would not have gone for armaments if a foolproof system of world-wide control had failed to take effect. Neither do the sponsors of the resolution ask that our people repose one modicum of trust in Russia—or that Russia repose one modicum of trust in America. Inspectors from each country would make absolutely certain, with their own eyes and ears, that the other had truly kept its agreement.

Some skeptics will no doubt brand this resolution as impractical and idealistic. I declare that the United States owes its greatness to idealism. I say we had better hope this program can work. I say that if we can get the ear of the Russian people, it will work. I say we had better start striving to see that it does work. I say there must be a positive alternative to all-out war. I challenge the skeptics to produce a superior program.

I believe that the resolution which my colleagues and I introduced last session—and which I shall reintroduce—informs the world that we have an affirmative program for justice and peace and human enrichment. I shall therefore press for formal action by the elected representatives of the people—showing that Congress is ready and eager to back a plan which can banish fear and want.

There is again talk of a Big Four meeting to compose international differences. The recent conference of British Commonwealth Prime Ministers called for a frank exchange of views with Stalin. I am all in favor of honorable negotiations.

If the Senate does its part—if it declares our friendship toward the ordinary people of Russia—if it puts its weight behind an audacious program for bread instead of bombs—the free world could enter upon meetings possessing a moral strength such as it has never before known. We could act to fill the giant vacuum of yearning across the world—yearning for a program adequate to establish peace and worthy of decent and free men.

In essence, the resolutions I commend to this Senate do no more than bring out from hiding what we Americans deeply believe. There is not a member of this Senate who wishes the needless death of a Russian soldier. Peace with justice has always been—and is now—the overriding objective of our citizens. Their hands have always been—and are now—outstretched in friendliness toward the ordinary Russian. They would like nothing better than a pooling of resources to lift the world toward a new city of man. These are the simple truths that will shine forth in the resolutions I advocate.

Senators, I am tired of being called a warmonger by propagandists whose sole purpose is to divide us from our allies. I am tired of having my colleagues denounced as warmongers. Many men have spoken in this debate whose views differ sharply from my own. But these men are not warmongers, whether they happen to occupy desks on the Democratic side of the aisle or the Republican side. On this issue of peace and good will toward other peoples, we stand united.

I want people everywhere to know this.

We are all of us fond of repeating that war is not inevitable. I fear that some of us take false refuge in such reiteration. We act almost as if we believe that merely wishing will make it so. We almost appear to think that verbal incantations will somehow repeal the inexorable laws of an accelerating arms race. Arguing against any such comforting notion is 5,000 years of history, which teaches over and over and over that arms races always lead to war—under today's conditions, atomic war.

Mr. President, unless we act boldly and immediately to wrench history from its present course, war is inevitable. It is still within our power, thank God, to confute this sombre prophecy—but we must act valiantly and we must act now.

This Senate has a responsibility that cannot be evaded. I think it is now incumbent upon this body to state in formal resolutions our profound desire to do anything and everything in our power to find an honorable and just alternative to otherwise inevitable war.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL RESPONSIBILITY OF CONGRESS

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, at some later date I expect to discuss at greater length some general aspects of the foreign policy of the United States. Today I shall confine my remarks to an important issue that is raised by the resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY]. Shall Congress recover its constitutional functions in the field of foreign relations? This is really what is involved in the Wherry resolution. Shall the Republic continue in the pattern intended by the founding fathers, or shall it go down the road to a military dictatorship?

Perhaps the most important duty of the Congress, as set forth in the Constitution, is to do what unfortunately President Truman seems to resent. That duty is to act as a check on the President, and to define the channels through which his power is to flow. As a part of a wise and far-seeing plan of checks and balances, the Constitution places in the Congress certain responsibilities in connection with foreign affairs.

None of us here have any illusions about the superior wisdom of Members of Congress. But when an important issue comes up on the floor of the Senate or the House it is discussed pro and con. What is said is reported in the newspapers and on the radio. Editors and commentators get into action. Then the people back home write to Washington. The result is that when a decision is reached, it is in a real sense a considered judgment of the American people.

This is why it is so important that the Congress act as a check or balance on the arbitrary power of the Chief Executive. Compare the President at his executive desk, sometimes alone, with the Congress carrying on the legislative process in a goldfish bowl before the public gaze. The wisdom of one department acting as a check or balance on the other becomes readily apparent.

I. CONSTITUTIONAL RESPONSIBILITY OF CONGRESS IN THE FIELD OF FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. President, article II, section 2 of the Constitution provides:

> He (the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

Clearly, all Senators, regardless of committee assignments, are expected to interest themselves in proposed agreements between the United States and foreign nations. All Senators have an equal voice in deciding whether or not treaties submitted to them by the President shall be ratified or rejected.

Under article I, section 8 of the Constitution, it is the further duty of the Congress "to define offenses against the law of nations," and "to declare war."

By giving the Congress the sole authority to declare war, it is made clear that no one man shall be permitted to say when and where the blood of American manhood is to be shed.

II. CONGRESS IN RECENT YEARS HAS FAILED TO CARRY OUT ITS CONSTITUTIONAL FUNCTIONS

Cynics have been heard to say that the last 18 years may mark the beginning of the decline of the American Republic.

Whether we like it or not the trend away from constitutional government has set in. Blank checks were the beginning. During the last 10 years we have begun to observe the lengthening shadow of a military dictatorship.

The question then is, Shall the Congress abdicate to the President its constitutional responsibility in the field of foreign relations? Here are two examples of what I mean:

A. SECRET AGREEMENTS, SECRETLY ARRIVED AT

Mr. President, on Monday, January 8, President Truman delivered his state-of-the-Union message to the Congress.

Thirty-three years before to a day, another American President delivered an address to a joint session of the Congress. On January 8, 1918, President Woodrow Wilson announced his famous 14-point peace program.

President Wilson's first point was:

> Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind, but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.

Mr. Wilson later amplified the point:

> For my own part, I am not willing to trust to the counsel of diplomats the working out of any salvation of the world from the things which it has suffered.

It is unfortunate that some of Mr. Wilson's successors in the White House, including the present incumbent, have not seen fit to follow this principle.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KEM. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I am very much interested in what the Senator has to say; but I think it is a well-known fact that President Wilson was worried by his war powers and wanted to get rid of them, and looked forward to the day when he could get rid of them, which is in striking contrast to things that have happened since then.

Mr. KEM. I thank the eminent Senator from Colorado for his very interesting comment, with which I quite agree.

Most of the difficulties in which we find ourselves today are due directly to secret covenants, secretly arrived at. I refer of course to Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam.

Have we learned anything from this experience? I do not know. No longer than a month ago the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Great Britain held a widely heralded but top-secret conference here in Washington. Upon its conclusion, a so-called communique was released, which communicated nothing. Reports carried in the British newspapers, indicated that Mr. Truman made important concessions to Mr. Attlee. It was said in the British press that Mr. Truman agreed, for example, not to take any action which would interfere with the flow of British trade with Red China through Hong Kong to the Chinese Communists.

On December 6, 1950, while the Truman-Attlee conference was still under way, I submitted, on behalf of myself and 23 other Senators, a resolution designed to accomplish two things:

First, to obtain a full report from the President on the results of his conference with the British Prime Minister.

Second, to prevent the President from making agreements with the Prime Minister affecting in any important way the course of action of this country, except by treaty entered into with the advice and consent of the Senate, as provided by the Constitution.

After some discussion, this resolution was referred to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, where it was pigeonholed, interred without the benefit of clergy—or whatever else the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] does to measures which do not happen to coincide with his own views.

It is commonplace to say that one's judgment is no better than one's information. How can the Senate expect to reach an intelligent decision on foreign policy unless it has access to all the facts? The President speaks glibly of a bipartisan foreign policy. We are asked to cooperate, while he operates in his own way, and makes available to Congress only such information as he thinks it is good for us to have.

American fingers have been burned quite enough by secret deals. I hope the Senate from this point on will demand that there be an end, to use President Wilson's language, to "private international understandings," and will insist—to use his language again—that our "diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view."

As President Wilson said:

> The theory of government which I decline to subscribe to is that the vitality of the Nation comes out of the closeted councils where a few men determine the policy of the country.

President Wilson, at a National Democratic Club Jefferson Dinner in 1908, also said:

> Must we fall back on discretionary Executive power? The Government of the United States was established to get rid of it.

A good deal of water has run over the dam since President Wilson used that language.

B. THE UNDECLARED WAR IN KOREA

A second example of the President arrogating to himself powers that are not constitutionally his, is the undeclared war in Korea, one of the most tragic episodes in American history. Last June 27 a major step was taken by the President of the United States toward the establishment of a military dictatorship.

On that day Mr. Truman ordered our Armed Forces into Korea. Neither branch of the Congress was consulted. The first the Senate knew of it was when there was made available on the floor of the Senate a copy of a press release issued from the White House.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEM. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. At that time did the Senator from Missouri protest?

Mr. KEM. Yes; I did, as vigorously as I could.

Mr. CONNALLY. Where?

Mr. KEM. In a few minutes I shall invite the attention of the Senator from Texas to the exact language I used. I am sorry that the Senator from Texas, whose memory, as I have observed it, is usually like a steel trap, does not recall the incident. If the Senator will bear with me for a few moments I shall give the exact language I used on the occasion about which he inquires.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am sorry, but I cannot remember everything the Senator has said on the floor of the Senate and that other Senators have said on the floor of the Senate. If I were to try to bring to mind everything that has been said on the floor of the Senate, I would need an encyclopedia.

Mr. KEM. I am sure the Senator has in mind the high lights of the discussion of our foreign policy. I regret his memory has played him a trick in this case.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. KEM. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I asked a polite question of the Senator.

Mr. KEM. What is it?

Mr. CONNALLY. The one the Senator just answered. I do not see any harm in that.

Mr. KEM. No; there is no harm in it. I am glad the Senator asked it, and I shall be glad to answer any further questions the Senator desires to ask.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator, however, seemed to take umbrage, and seemed to feel surprised that I did not know everything about his speeches.

Mr. KEM. If the Senator from Texas had followed some of the things I have said on the floor in the past, I think the history of the United States would be somewhat different than it is today.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. KEM. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not know all who protested, but no one on the floor, as I recall, did anything to stop the sending of troops to Korea. As a matter of fact, when the troops went into Korea nearly all threw up their hats and shouted "Hurrah"; and now a great many of those "hurrahers" are complaining and objecting and denouncing and hair pulling, and so on.

Mr. KEM. If the Senator will be patient, I shall invite his attention to the exact language I used on that occasion.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator will put it in the RECORD, will he not? I must leave the Senate in a moment.

Mr. KEM. Yes. I am proceeding to do so.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEM. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Is it not true that the Senate had no chance to act on the policy of the President; that it was a fait accompli?

Mr. KEM. Yes; that is quite true.

Mr. WHERRY. Is it not true that the Congress had no chance to determine about the matter of going into Korea? The boys were there and we had to support them. That was all that was left to do. Is that not true?

Mr. KEM. Yes, unfortunately.

Mr. WHERRY. Will not the adoption of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska result in preventing another Korea, and in permitting the Congress of the United States to determine whether or not we are going to have happen in Europe exactly what happened in Korea? Is that not true?

Mr. KEM. Yes. There was nothing the Senators in the minority could do about it. But one Senator, at least—and I think there were others—protested at the time respecting the unconstitutionality of the act the President had committed. I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. President, as I was saying, when Mr. Truman ordered our Armed Forces into Korea neither branch of the Congress was consulted. The first the Senate knew of it was when there was made available on the floor of the Senate a copy of the press release issued from the White House. We then had a fait accompli, as the Senator from Nebraska has said.

How well I remember the then majority leader, the former Senator from Illinois, Mr. Lucas, reading to the Senate the release, since only one copy was available.

The President said:

> I have ordered United States air and sea forces to give the Korean Government troops cover and air support.
> I have ordered the Seventh Fleet to prevent any attack on Formosa.

Not once in his 407-word statement did the President refer to the Congress of the United States, which has the authority—the sole and exclusive authority—under our Constitution to declare war. Yes, the President, as they say in our—his and my—native State of Missouri, was riding high that day. When the Senator from Illinois had finished reading the White House press release, I raised the question as to whether the President had arrogated to himself the power to declare war. Mr. President, that is the answer to the inquiry just made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. Let me repeat that when the Senator from Illinois had finished reading the press release, I raised the question of whether the President had arrogated to himself the power to declare war. The answer was the pretense that our participation in Korea was only a police action. We know differently now. American casualties already number nearly 50,000. Fourteen billion dollars of the public money has been spent. Some 50,000 young Americans have been killed or wounded. Yet the Congress, 7 months after the President's order, has not recognized what must be apparent to everyone—that a state of war exists. This is government by a man, not by the Constitution.

I hope and pray that Congress will act promptly to prevent the possibility of the making of any further secret deals selling our friends down the river, or to avoid further undeclared wars.

How many sons of American mothers must die before we act to curb resolutely the threat of what President Wilson described as "discretionary Executive power"?

III. CONGRESS SHOULD DECIDE WHETHER TROOPS SHOULD BE SENT TO EUROPE

The President now proposes to embark on a new military venture—this time in Western Europe. He has apparently decided to go through with it, regardless of the judgment of the Congress or the wishes of the American people.

Mr. Truman made his plans quite clear at his news conference on January 11.

The New York Herald Tribune of January 12 carried the following story on Mr. Truman's remarks at the conference:

President Truman declared today he will consult with Congress before sending American troops to Europe, but made it clear he will not seek congressional permission to do so. * * *

With vigor he accepted the challenge of those in Congress who would seek to exercise control over such troop commitments by tying up military appropriation. If they want to go to the country on that, Mr. Truman said, he would go with them. He added that he had gone to the country once before and licked his congressional critics.

An argument has been made along this line against the adoption of the pending resolution: "Let's not take any action until General Eisenhower returns from Europe and presents his views as to whether it is advisable to send troops on a large scale to Europe. When he returns, we shall know then whether it is desirable to send troops to Europe—whether on a large scale or on a small scale or not at all."

However, Mr. President, what General Eisenhower has to say may have little effect on the plans of the President. Mr. Truman seems to have already made up his mind—and this, regardless of whether General Eisenhower agrees with the President's preconceived views.

The Baltimore Sun of January 12 carried the following report of the President's news conference on the preceding day:

"And do you expect to send more troops to Europe" a reporter asked.

"Certainly," said the President, adding that he saw no point in going to all of the trouble of making the Atlantic Treaty arrangements and sending General Eisenhower over to take charge of Western European defense unless we meant to go through with the project.

Mr. President, the President of the United States has no constitutional authority to carry out this dazzling military adventure.

He has no such authority under the terms of the Atlantic Treaty or under the MAP—the military aid program.

In April 1949, the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations held hearings on the North Atlantic Pact. I am sure the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] was present. During Secretary of State Acheson's testimony, he was asked the following question by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] and made the following answer:

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Are we going to be expected to send substantial numbers of troops over there as a more or less permanent contribution to the development of these countries' capacity to resist?

Secretary ACHESON. The answer to that question, Senator, is a clear and absolute "No."

Mr. President, the question arises, will Congress acquiesce in the President's grab for power? Or will Congress make it clear that from now on it intends to carry on as a coordinate—not a subordinate—branch of the Government?

Let us begin by asserting the authority to say when and where American boys are to be called upon to fight, suffer, and die.

IV. SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE SHOULD NOT BE PERMITTED TO PIGEONHOLE WHERRY RESOLUTION

Mr. President, I wish to discuss one more point, and then I shall be through. It has been indicated that a motion may be made to refer the Wherry resolution to the Foreign Relations Committee.

I have great respect for the members of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. They, and their predecessors, have rendered valiant service to their country. I am confident they will continue to do so.

They will readily agree, I know, that the primary purpose of the committee is to expedite the Senate's business. Its existence in no way lessens the solemn responsibility of every Member of the Senate in matters pertaining to our foreign policy.

The Constitution makes no provision for congressional committees. In fact, the Congress managed to get along fairly well without them for a number of years after the Constitution went into effect. It was not until 1816 that a Senate Committee on Foreign Relations was established. Previous to that time, questions relating to foreign affairs either were dealt with directly on the floor of the Senate, or were referred to a select temporary committee appointed to consider a particular subject.

I hope the Senate will reject any motion to send the pending resolution to a waiting committee pigeonhole. This is the first test during the present session as to whether the Senate is determined to reaffirm its constitutional role in the conduct of our foreign policy. It is its first opportunity to prove that the Senate has no intention to relinquish to the President its constitutional responsibility to say when and where American sons are to be called on to fight and die.

V. WE WANT NO MILITARY DICTATOR IN THE UNITED STATES

We want no military dictator in this country. There is no room for one on America's free soil. Congress must not permit itself to be thwarted. Its lawful functions must not be further undermined by the executive branch.

As I have warned on a previous occasion, the Congress must not permit itself to be relegated to the status of the Roman Senate under Diocletian, to the condition of the Estates General under Louis XIV, or to the position of the Reichstag under Hitler.

The separation of the powers of government provided in the Constitution must be asserted. The Congress must continue to operate as a coordinate branch of the Government.

I hope the resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska will be promptly approved.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEM. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I desire to thank the distinguished Senator from Missouri for the very forceful argument he has presented in setting forth that it is for the Congress to determine what the character of the aid shall be in implementing agreements made under the provisions of the North Atlantic Pact; and, whether the President has the constitutional power or not, that high policy shall be determined by the Congress as the representatives of the people, and that the people shall be permitted to speak. I thank the Senator for his observations.

Mr. KEM. I appreciate the kind remarks of the able minority leader.

THE NICKEL SITUATION

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, as we stand at the beginning of a new year, and in the early stages of a new war-preparedness program, I think I voice the sentiments of many of my colleagues when I say I hope that, in the months ahead, we may be able to avoid many of the mistakes which were made during the period of World War II. Anything which any of us can do to help in avoiding such mistakes, it is our duty to do.

Mr. President, the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], in his capacity as chairman of the Subcommittee on Preparedness of the Committee on Armed Services, has recently brought to the attention of the Senate and of the country the report of his subcommittee on the situation with respect to one of the most important strategic metals, namely, nickel.

The Senator from Texas and his subcommittee are to be greatly complimented for their fine work; and their accomplishment, in focusing attention on the nickel situation, as they have done, deserves commendation.

The Senator from Texas did not, in his report on the nickel situation, touch upon a phase of that situation which was extremely serious during the recent war. I venture to mention that phase because it is one which might well become extremely serious in the months ahead, if the kind of mistakes which were made once should be allowed to be repeated.

The situation to which I refer is not, in my opinion, confined to the nickel industry, or to those who are interested in the production of nickel. It is a situation which, in the past, has arisen many times with respect to many items of production. Similar situations are bound to arise many times more, and it is possible that mistakes might be made which could do inestimable harm, unless prevented by extreme watchfulness and prompt and vigorous action where necessary.

What I refer to—and I speak now, purposely, in general terms—is the situation in which representatives or former representatives of a particular industry or other special interest, brought into positions of power and influence in the Government, are tempted to use that power and influence for the benefit of the particular industry or interest with which they are or formerly were associated, even though the best interests of the United States may lie in another direction.

In 1944 the Senate Special Committee To Investigate Industrial Centralization, of which I had the honor to be chairman, went at length into one situation such as I have described; and it happened to be a situation which involved nickel. It also involved chromium and iron ore.

Some of the hearings which we held in that matter were presided over by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], who did very fine work on that special committee, as he always does on any committee to which he is assigned.

In that particular series of hearings, we were concerned with a small company, the Cascade Alloy Co., which wanted to produce chrome nickel steel—armor-plate steel—in the United States, from ores mined in the United States. That was a somewhat revolutionary proposal, because, as those familiar with the industry know, we traditionally get our nickel and our chrome from outside the United States. This proposal for developing our own resources to produce a type of steel which was extremely critical, and of which there was a serious shortage, might have been expected to meet with a prompt welcome in Washington; but that was not the case. As a matter of fact, the proposal stepped on some very sensitive toes, in effect; and the result was to set off a chain reaction which operated very effectively to prevent that plan for producing chrome nickel steel in the United States from United States ores from ever getting started.

How the proposal was sidetracked, time after time; how it was shunted from one Government agency to another; how obstacles, both real and imaginary, were located or created and thrown in the path of this proposal; how evidence in support of the plan was misinterpreted, or buried, or misplaced; all this makes an extremely interesting story. The part played in all this by representatives or former representatives of the International Nickel Co., and representatives or former representatives of corporations friendly to or associated with the International Nickel Co., also makes an extremely interesting story. The details are too long to recount here; but Senators who are interested will find them developed in the hearings of the Senate Special Committee To Investigate Industrial Centralization, in the Cascade Alloy case. I can assure my colleagues those hearings make extremely interesting reading. It is just like reading a book.

I have mentioned this matter today, Mr. President, because I do not feel that what happened in the case of the Cascade Alloy Corp. was an isolated instance. I think it was substantially the same thing that happened in other cases; and I think it is the same thing that might happen in the future, unless steps are taken to prevent it from happening.

What happened in the Cascade Alloy case, speaking very bluntly, is that the development of an American resource, and the production, in America, of urgently needed defense materials, was prevented because the success of the proposed undertaking would have been contrary to the commercial interests of certain large corporations, not all of which were even United States corporations.

I know that similar situations existed; and it was the intention of the Senate Special Committee on Industrial Centralization to have gone into some of those other situations. Unfortunately, as Senators may remember—and to the mind of the senior Senator from Nevada, it was extremely unfortunate—the Special Committee To Investigate Industrial Centralization was not continued beyond the end of 1944; and so its work was not completed.

I am sorry to say that result was brought about on a purely political basis, and for purely political reasons. Nevertheless, the special committee was dissolved, its work was halted in midflight, and it was not even permitted to file a final report.

All that, of course, is water over the dam, and what we are interested in is looking ahead to the future.

I have sent to the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] a copy of the hearings in the Cascade Alloy case, for his information; and I earnestly hope his subcommittee, which is concerning itself with the defense effort, will give special attention, in the months ahead, to the type of activity we uncovered in those hearings back in 1944.

The new defense agencies—I almost said "war" agencies, and I do not think I would have made any great mistake if I had said that—are filling up with men who have left their desks in private industry to come to Washington to do their part in the defense effort. There will be an increasing number of such men stepping into high places—and into places which, while not high, are nevertheless important from the standpoint of both policy making and day-to-day operations—in the weeks and months just ahead of us. I do not want it understood that I think that is bad. On the whole, it is good. We need such men in Government; and many of these men will be making very substantial personal sacrifices, financial and otherwise, in order to serve their country.

But there are two factors in this situation which we must watch. One is the factor of conditioned thinking, if I may call it that; the simple fact that a man who has been trained through the years to think in terms of the welfare of a particular corporation or a particular industry or a particular segment of our economy is likely to go on thinking that way unless he makes a conscious mental effort to jar himself into a new thinking pattern. Second, the fact that even though the vast majority of these new civil servants may be as high-minded and patriotic as any group of Federal employees can be, yet the effectiveness of their collective effort can be greatly diminished by even a small minority who will be willing to serve their old masters where they think they can get away with it, or in cases where they cannot see how helping their old employer will hurt the Government.

Right there, I think I have made reference to a situation which involves a bit of twisted thinking that is getting to be very common in our Government, and which needs to be straightened out. What I am referring to is the concept that it is all right for a Government employee to help a former employer, if he does not do anything contrary to the interests of the Government.

In private industry, perhaps that viewpoint is entirely acceptable. If a man is working for corporation A, having formerly worked for corporation B, why should he not do anything he can for corporation B so long as he does not do anything against the best interests of corporation A, his present employer? I am willing to leave the answering of that question to those who are working in private industry; but I submit that when a man leaves private industry to go to work for the Government of the United States, the case is entirely different. It is contrary to the best interests of the United States for any officer or employee in the executive branch of the Federal Government to do anything in his official capacity or in the course of his official duties which will help or favor one private corporation, or one private industry, over another.

Government, to be successful, must be impartial; and the bare fact that one private interest is being helped because of its connections or former connections with a Government official or employee is a bad situation even though no one else is being hurt.

Mr. President, I shall not press this subject further, except that I do want to express the hope, at this time, that the Senator from Texas and his subcommittee will be especially vigilant with respect to this situation which I have been discussing, and will undertake to try, as best they may, to prevent the occurrence, in the period that lies ahead of us, of anything like what happened in the Cascade Alloy case.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado obtained the floor.

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, will the Senator yield in order that I may make a short statement?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I shall be glad to yield if I do not lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCLELLAN in the chair). Is there objection to the Senator from Colorado yielding to the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Nebraska is recognized.

TRANSFER OF TITLE TO CERTAIN LANDS TO THE COLVILLE INDIANS, WASHINGTON

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, it will be recalled that in the Eighty-first Congress, House bill 2432, providing for the transfer of the title to 818,000 acres of land from the United States to the Colville Indians in the State of Washington, passed the House of Representatives and was reported by the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. A similar bill, Senate bill 1022, was introduced in the Senate. I filed a minority report on House bill 2432, which minority report sets forth the reasons why this bill should not pass. The bill died on the Senate Calendar with the Eighty-first Congress.

Senate bill 378 has now been introduced in the present session of Congress, which is identical with that of House bill 2432 and Senate bill 1022 of the Eighty-first Congress.

This proposed legislation, if enacted into law, would deprive the United States of many millions of dollars; it would tend to retard the Indians in the free exercise of their American way of life; it would tend to communize the Indians; it would aid in the perpetuation of the Indian Bureau and forever relegate these Indians and their property to a status of supervision and control by the Indian Bureau; it would permit a puppet Indian tribal council to dissipate the funds of the tribe; and it would give to certain attorneys and conspiring persons the right to share in the loot of the puppet council.

It appears that practically all the Colville Indians, the residents of Ferry and Okanogan Counties, the Tri-County Mining Association, the Northwest Mining Association, other mining and prospectors associations, and individual miners and prospectors are opposed to this proposed legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the statements of Hiram B. Runnels, Marcel Arcasa, and Jim O'Brien, three Colville Indians, who testified before a Senate subcommittee hearing at Spokane, Wash., on November 21, 1950, concerning these bills, be inserted at this point in the RECORD in connection with my remarks. It is my belief that the reading of these statements will tend to inform those who are interested in this important program.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TESTIMONY OF HIRAM B. RUNNELS

Mr. RUNNELS. We in particular are indebted to the Honorable Senator BUTLER of Nebraska. We have been in correspondence with him for several months. We feel very grateful for what he has done for us. I wish it would have been possible for him to have been here. There are many Indians present who would like to have met him.

We can assure Senator BUTLER that he is appreciated by every Indian on the Colville Indian Reservation, except perhaps Frank George and his Bureau stooges.

We are also grateful to Senator O'MAHONEY, the chairman of this committee, for his part in having this hearing here, and to Senator MURRAY, who has sacrified his time to come out to this hearing.

We are very grateful.

Senator MURRAY. Thank you, Mr. Runnels, and I am sure that Mr. BUTLER, although he is not able to attend, will study the record very thoroughly and will give it the same consideration as if he was here present.

Mr. RUNNELS. Honorable Senator MURRAY, chairman, we are sorry that WALTER HORAN is not here. We wanted to tell him personally how much we opposed his bill H. R. 2432.

We are also sorry, we wanted to tell Senator MAGNUSON the same thing.

At the beginning, I wanted to state I speak for practically 100 percent of the Colville Indians, and we are absolutely opposed to the Horan-Magnuson bills. Of course, I do not represent Frank George's stooges.

We want to be understood that the Northwest Mining Association should not agree to any compromise on these bills for us. We have seen in the papers, and otherwise, that Hoagland effected a compromise, and it had been agreed to by the Northwest Mining Association. We want no part of it.

The Northwest Mining Association is a fine organization. We hope that they will not sell us down the river by this compromise.

In 1891–92 a commission was appointed. This agreement was fulfilled for the north half of the Colville Indians, in which the Indians received $1,500,000. Congress substantially ratified the agreement accepting the payment of $1,500,000.

The Indians were dissatisfied and hired lawyers to secure the $1,500,000 as per agreement. The contract with the lawyers was for 10 years, the contract expiring in 1904. In 1904, at the expiration of the contract, other attorneys agreed to collect the $1,500,000, leaving the amount of the attorneys' fees to be fixed by the Court of Claims, which the court fixed at $60,000.

In 1905 James McLaughlin negotiated an agreement with the Indians, opening the south half of the reservation, which agreement included the payment of $1,500,000, which the Government had failed to pay pursuant to the agreement of 1891. The Congress again failed to ratify this agreement. Instead Congress enacted a law following the terms of the McLaughlin agreement, except the payment of the $1,500,000. The $1,500,000 was paid under a separate act, less attorneys' fees of $60,000.

The act of March 22, 1906, which is a substitute of the McLaughlin agreement, provided for the opening of the south half of the Colville Reservation for the allotment of land to the Indians, and the Indians were to receive the proceeds of the homestead entries. Where did this money go?

By the agreements of 1892 and 1905, the Indians relinquished title to all their lands on the Colville Indian Reservation.

If the Indians were deceived in making these agreements, the Indians now have the Indian Claims Commission to present their claims against the Government. The Indians have tried for years to get an opportunity to present their claims to the Court of Claims. But now we have the Indian Claims Commission, so suit can be brought against the Government without a special bill.

The members of the Colville Confederated Tribes were never allowed to vote on any attorney, but the tribal council, without the consent of the tribe, entered into a contract with James E. Curry, of Washington, D. C., and Lyle Keith, of Spokane, Wash. They have done nothing, and time is running out.

The Indians are anxious that suit be commenced, but the Indians want the opportunity to select their own attorney. The members of the tribe have never authorized the council to select their attorneys. Frank George really appointed James E. Curry, without the tribe's consent. Mr. Curry is attorney or legal counsel for the National Congress of American Indians.

Mr. Frank George is vice president of this organization, who has been instrumental in taking money out of tribal funds to pay dues to the Congress of American Indians. In other words, he has taken upon himself to make every enrolled Indian a member of this organization without their consent.

In the present budget set-up, which is found on page 28 of the minutes of April 13–14, 1950, it appears there that $3,000 is taken for this purpose.

Mr. Frank George's position with the tribal council is tribal relations official. How he got this position we do not know. However, the members of the tribe were not consulted. He travels to all parts of the United States and we have not been furnished an accounting of his expenditures.

Senator, we would like to have Mr. George furnish us with a statement of his expenditures and place it in the records.

In connection with Frank George's employment, I wish to place the following letter in the record.

Senator MURRAY. The letter referred to by the witness will be marked exhibit 4 and carried in the records at this point.

INCHELIUM, WASH., September 26, 1950.
COLVILLE INDIAN COMMERCIAL CLUB,
Nespelem, Wash.:

We, the undersigned, do declare that the Colville Indian business council met at Nespelem Indian council hall on January 8 and 9 in 1948. At this meeting Frank George, tribal council clerk, carrying the rating of CAF 5, asked for an increased rating of CAF 6, to which the council agreed to give. Then, in the minutes, after Frank George types up the minutes of the meeting, he inserts for himself the title of tribal relations clerk, which is an entirely different rating and different salary than what the business council approved for him. Then in the resolution he types up for himself, the blanket authority which covers all the business on the reservation, and also the intertribal relations clerk, and then on top of all this he takes upon himself the title of Colville tribal treasurer, giving him the sole authority to spend our money, however he sees fit. And then in April, 1948, when the January 1948 minutes were read, several of the councilmen were intoxicated and some asleep, and then that is when the minutes were read and passed on—but the resolutions were never read.

We feel that Frank George has assumed all this authority fraudulently and to the detriment of all the Colville Indians. Because too, the resolution was signed and approved by Mr. Towle, who was not at the agency at that time, since W. W. Head was the superintendent in charge at that time.

We now feel that Frank George should reimburse the tribe all the money he has spent under this false title.

We are ready, with the support of the whole tribe behind us to remove him from his present over-all position.

The signatures below are of a member of the present council, and a former councilman who was serving on the council in 1948.

FLORENCE QUILL.

Congressman HORAN states, on page 61 of the House hearing, he quotes a statement which is supposed to have been made by the tribal council, reading as follows:

"Present-day Colville Indian leaders feel that their forefathers were betrayed by the Government probably through erroneous interpretation when Mr. James McLaughlin negotiated the agreement of December 1, 1905, when it was stipulated that payment for the north half was contingent on the Indians signing away additional portions of their diminished land base."

This statement is absolutely untrue as there are 350 signers to the contract besides the Indian chiefs, and many of them are still living, of whom I am personally acquainted with. I did not sign it myself because I was at school at Haskell Institute, Kansas. If I would have been here on the reservation, I would have signed it.

In talking with a person who signed the McLaughlin agreement at that time, and since, it was the unanimous opinion that the promise of the payment of the $1,500,000 was what prompted the Indians to sign the agreement for the relinquishment of the south half of the Colville Indian Reservation.

The Indians before that time, for many years, had tried to make the Government pay the $1,500,000, so they were very happy to make a settlement.

On February 20, 1896, the north half of the Colville Indian Reservation was opened to mineral location under the United States mineral laws of 1872.

And on July 1, 1898, the south half was opened to mineral, relating to entry and location of mineral land.

We, the members of the Colville Tribe, feel that since that existed in 1898, we want the mining locations to continue. We want it strictly understood that we have never authorized the Northwest Mining Association to compromise in any way, shape, or form, which would disturb the location of mining claims according to mining laws of the United States. Nor have we ever authorized the county commissioners of Ferry and Okanogan Counties to compromise this mineral entry proposition. Nor do we approve of Mr. Hoagland's activities in this respect. He apparently is working for the county commissioners and is being paid out of our tribal funds.

I want to refer you to the April council minutes of April 13–14, 1950, and from pages 1 and 2 I want to read the following:

"Mr. Hoagland was to be complimented on the interest he has taken and for all he has accomplished. He had been doing his utmost to put things across, and had been able to reach people who could not have been contacted without him. His enthusiasm and interest in assisting the Colvilles had been very sincere.

"Mr. Keith had had a different part to play and was in a position to do what neither Mr. Hoagland nor others could have done and he surely has done everything possible to help, and he was able to unlock doors making it possible to get this matter to people who were needed."

Senator MURRAY. I understand that this statement has already been printed in the minority report, which is now in the Senate. If that is true, then it won't be necessary to repeat it here.

Mr. RUNNELS. In Senator BUTLER's report, on page 30, it is stated that Mr. Hoagland did not register as a lobbyist. If he had registered we would have known who had paid his expenses and how much Ferry County and Okanogan County and tribal funds was used in connection with Mr. Hoagland's trips to Washington, D. C.

Mr. Senator, did Mr. Hoagland violate any law when he failed to register? If he did violate the law, who is going to prosecute him?

Many letters have been written to Senators. Here is one written to Senator MAGNUSON, which I wish to submit for the record.

Senator MURRAY. It will be carried in the record as exhibit 5.

NESPELEM, WASH., February 8, 1950.

Senator WARREN G. MAGNUSON,
Senate Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MAGNUSON: I respectfully ask that H. R. 2432 and Senate bill 1021 be referred back to a subcommittee of your committee to be a hearing in or near Spokane, Wash., soon, for the following reasons:

I am a mining claim owner on the Colville Indian Reservation for the past 41 years. I, with my copartner, have options with eastern people, now we are informed that they could not and would not put any money into a set-up like this because they may not get title to the claims. I have talked to a good many people and they all agree that no one will put up money to develop mining claims here under the present set-up.

It is common knowledge that the Interior or Indian Bureau cannot give any information or data on this land as to its mineral value for leasing for mining purposes. If the Bureau insists on leasing mineral lands now, then we never had any rights on this land at any time; now in fairness to us, if we cannot own these claims then tell us to get off or compensate us for our years of effort.

Yours respectfully,

FRANK OSTROWSKI.

The proposed budget of the tribal council provides a consultant mining engineer.

There has been no prospecting or mining upon the reservation since the illegal withdrawal order of Mr. Ickes in 1934, which was rescinded in 1935 (p. 23 of H. R. 2432 shows a letter from Collier to the Secretary of the Interior).

Our tribal council, as it is now constituted, is nothing but a puppet for the Indian Bureau. Some of the members are employees of the Indian Bureau. Others have loans which are granted by the council themselves. Great favoritism is practiced so that only the favored few are benefited by the council's action.

The council members are dissipating the tribal funds, as will be seen by the proposed budget found on page 28 of the minutes of the tribal council meeting of April 13–14, 1950. I respectfully ask that this page of the items of the expenditures be copied and inserted in the record of this hearing.

"Whereas the finance committee of the Colville Business Council recommended the proposed budget to be paid from Colville tribal funds for the fiscal year 1952 as follows:

"1. Per diem and mileage for council members, regular and special committee members, members of special investigating committee, members of tribal election boards, credit committee or loan board members, and all other tribal groups or individuals as authorized by council action	$4,500
2. Salaries, inclusive of within-grade salary increases	25,443
3. Miscellaneous expenses	8,600
4. Burial of deceased members of the Confederated Tribes of the Colville Reservation	4,500
5. Tuition for Indian children to be paid St. Mary's Mission, Omak, Wash., and Sacred Heart Mission, De Smet, Idaho	8,000
6. Tribal attorneys	3,500
7. Claims attorneys	5,000
8. Consultant mining engineer	4,000
9. General wildlife management and propagation	2,000
10. Operation and maintenance charges	500
11. Range improvement and maintenance of structures	2,000
12. Fire suppression and presuppression activities	15,000
13. Expenses connected with membership in intertribal organizations	3,000
Total	86,043"

I direct particular attention to a few items in the said proposed budget:

"Item 1. Provides for tribal council expenses	$4,500
Item 3. Miscellaneous expenses	8,600
Item 6. Tribal attorneys (Messrs. Keith and Winston, Spokane, Wash.)	3,500
Item 7. Claims attorney (James E. Curry and associates, Washington, D. C.)	5,000
Item 8. Consulting mining engineer (Everett Hoagland)	4,000
Item 13. Membership in intertribal organizations (membership dues, Congress of American Indians)	3,000"

The tribal council has employed Frank George as tribal relations official at a very large salary. We have no need of such an official. In addition, his wife is also employed at the agency and drawing a large salary, paid out of our tribal funds. There are many other wives and husbands employed at the agency office. This practice should not be tolerated as there are many competent young people who would like to be employed here.

Here is a list of the names of wives and husbands for the record: Mr. Richard and wife, Mr. Ed Hall and wife, Mr. Lightfoot and wife, Mr. Williams and wife, Mr. Jack Condon and wife, Mr. Frank George and wife, Mr. Jack Clark and wife.

And one party transferred from the Spokane Indian Reservation, Wash. He and his wife are employed.

Very few are qualified voters who go to the polls to vote. I would make it in my judgment less than 25 percent. This lack of interest is due to the fact that these elections are Bureau controlled.

Attempts have been made to correct the voting system, but the Bureau officials have always vetoed them. Any suggestion in the improvements of the elections receives the adverse rulings of the Superintendent.

A fair example to show how the council operates: At the meeting that the council held on April 13–14, 1950, Mr. Graves, Superintendent, and Mr. Keith, attorney for the council, when the matter of the Horan-Magnuson bill was under discussion, both Mr. Graves and Mr. Keith very strongly admonished the members of the council not to reveal any of the statements made regarding these bills because they stated that a single Senator in opposition could stop the passage of the bill and, furthermore, they asked the council and members of the tribe not to reveal a thing what was said or had taken place. Yet nothing concerning these statements appear in the minutes of April 13–14, 1950.

It would appear that the record shows whatever, in their judgment, should be recorded, and nothing else. Such seems to be the general practice.

Indian Bureau has used every effort possible to stop this Senate investigation. To cite you one of many instances: Last July Joe Kohler, chairman of the Ferry County commissioners, drove 65 miles to contact me. He said he had a wire from Congressman HORAN to contact me and asked me to wire my withdrawal of my objections to H. R. 2432, the Horan bill providing for the restoration of the 818,000 acres to the Indians.

I told him I am no backslider, and it was a damn poor time for me to crawfish. He told me that if I would withdraw my objections, he would see me later.

I further told him what we need is a senatorial investigation of the whole agency group, that matters were getting worse.

At that time I contacted about 15 or 20 young Indians who are veterans of World War II. I asked them, "What do you boys want, land or money?" They all said, "Give us money and give us full citizenship. We gain nothing by being under the authority of the Indian Agency."

I will cite you another case, just to show you the power and influence the Indian Bureau has. One William Derickson has a 160-acre allotment. A white man leases his allotment for $300 per year. The white man pays him $150 down. They go to the agency to have a lease drawn up. The extension agent tells him, "You cannot lease your land for dry farming. Your land is grazing land, which we are leasing for 10 cents per acre."

Every Indian who has received his allotment and received a patent that I have talked with does not want the 818,000 acres. They want the money so they can be on their own. They do not want to prolong the Indian Office here any longer.

Some of the councilmen are independent and want to do the right thing. At least five of the council members have tried to work for the best interests of the tribe.

The council was tricked into authorizing him to act for them. This authority now which Frank George claims was made at the meeting of the council January 9, 1948, when the council had adjourned and many of the councilmen were on their way home.

John Cleveland called a few of the councilmen together, supposed to be a quorum, the members that George controlled. Cleveland told them that something had been overlooked at the meeting. He suggested that a tribal relations officer has not been taken up. These members which Cleveland called together voted to adopt his suggestion of appointing a tribal relations officer. No formal resolution was offered in writing to vote upon, but George thereafter prepared the resolution, which was inserted in the minutes as having been voted upon and adopted. The minutes contained a resolution authorizing the establishment of the position of tribal relations officer. These minutes were not made available to the council for 6 months.

By such trickery all the authority of the council was transferred to Frank George, so if such authority is conferred in Frank George, there is no more need of a tribal council. Subsequent action of Frank George will so show.

These bills—the Horan-Magnuson bills, were instigated and prepared by Frank George, the superintendent and other Bureau officials, without the knowledge or consent of members of the tribe or tribal council.

The so-called program which is tied in with these bills was concocted by Frank George and his fellow stooges. On such a radical change in policy the members of the tribe should have a voice. The tribe at least should have a referendum vote to either accept or reject the proposition.

It goes to show that the Indian Agency at Nespelem is no benefit to the Indians. It only serves to figure out a program on paper, and Frank George, in his capacity as acting in his full authority of the council, votes himself money out of tribal funds to travel about the country, representing himself or assuming to represent the Colville Indians.

We, the Colville Tribe, whom we represent, ask for a full and complete statement of how much tribal money has been spent by Frank George and his assistant, Mrs. Lightfoot, since January 1948.

Frank George some time ago had the nerve to ask for an increase in his salary. I think he asked for $4,900 a year. Mr. Pryse, the area director of Portland, turned it down, and he has gone about the country and vilified Mr. Pryse. Among other things, he is advocating the abolishment of Mr. Pryse's office.

Such views of Frank George have been widely published in newspapers.

Frank George has an underling in a man by the name of Pete Lemery, who does whatever George tells him. This man Lemery is one of the present Indian councilmen. He is employed by the agency. The balance of the time he is employed by the agency under the direction of Frank George, so Frank George sees to it that Pete Lemery has full employment all year around. Pete Lemery lives in a Government-owned house at the agency, so he is well taken care of by Frank George. This is the same Pete Lemery who is on the council and is a puppet for Frank George on the council.

Frank George also provides periodical employment for other council members who are subservient to him, so one can see what this council amounts to.

Pete Lemery was declared elected in the 1949 election by the superintendent, Graves, by absentee votes. By the unofficial count two candidates were ahead of Lemery. I was 9 votes ahead of him, but 14 absentee votes came in. Lemery beat me by five votes.

I then wrote a letter to Superintendent Graves asking him to furnish me the names and addresses of the 14 absentee voters who were supposed to have voted for Lemery, copies of letters requesting absentee ballots, and permission to see the envelopes and postmarks containing the absentee ballots. I never received any reply from Mr. Graves. I know he received my letter marked "personal."

Several months after the time of mailing the letter to Mr. Graves, I asked Graves why he never answered my letter about Pete Lemery's absentee votes. He told me he never did receive my letter. He stated he never received the letter. I told him I had addressed the letter to him properly and placed the return address on the left-hand corner of the envelope and that he must have received it. He then told me I was a liar. I said if anyone was a liar he was, because the letter would have been returned to me.

The absentee voting is very seldom used in our elections. Many of the candidates did not receive any absentee votes.

Pete Lemery, being a Government employee and hanging around the agency a great deal of the time, buttonholes Indians coming in from Idaho and other places to transact business with the agency and contacts them for absentee votes. He seems to get them. I do not know whether these 14 voters voted in that manner or not, but I am quite sure no one else received any votes at that election.

Also all the absentee ballots have to come through Frank George, so anyone can judge for himself how a man like Pete Lemery is elected.

Pete Lemery has been an employee of the agency for many years, including that of policeman some years ago. He was relieved of his duties on account of drunkenness. He then was employed by the Indian roads division, and finally was reinstated by Superintendent Graves. So the agency always keeps him, no matter what he may do in regard to breaking the rules and regulations.

Pete Lemery, while employed by the Government in some capacity not too long ago, induced a man to make his will in his favor. This man lives around Inchelium. He is an old man, has no relatives, in ill health, received old-age pension. Pete Lemery went to him and told him to make a will leaving all property to him. This man owns an allotment of considerable value. The man has continuously asked that the land be sold so that he can use the proceeds of such sale so he could care for himself during the last days of his life.

The agency approved of this will. I presume Mr. Lemery will acquire this estate when, in all honesty and decency, this man should be permitted to sell his allotment so he can live in comfort during the balance of his life. The man has tuberculosis and he cannot live very much longer, if he is not already dead.

By this kind of dealings by Pete Lemery, and approved by the Indian Bureau, they will deprive this old man of a few happy days and defraud the State of Washington of considerable money. This man lives in despair and poverty, yet the Indian Bureau is responsible for this situation.

In 1948 we had a referendum vote on the proposition of a general election system to apply to the Colville Reservation. This proposition carried by a large majority but the Indian Bureau vetoed it, so we now have election laws suitable to the Indian Bureau, but not to us.

Frank George has made every Colville Indian a member of the Congress of American Indians, assessing each member 5 cents, each taking the money out of tribal funds without the knowledge or consent of the tribe. At our meeting with Indians from the Umatilla, Yakima, and the Coast Indians, we were to vote on our membership by general election, but we never did.

Petitions have been and now are being circulated asking that the $1,600,000 now in the United States Treasury be distributed to the members of the Colville Tribe and that the Indians be given their freedom from Bureau control and be given their rights and privileges as citizens.

These petitions are addressed to Senator HUGH BUTLER and are being circulated and are being signed by members of the tribe, and I believe that 95 percent of the members of the tribe will sign these petitions, and many hundreds have signed these petitions.

I ask that these petitions be placed in the records of these hearings, and we be permitted to send in additional signed petitions for the record:

PETITION

To HON. HUGH BUTLER,
United States Senator,
Washington, D. C.:

Whereas $1,600,000 of Colville Indian funds is now in the hands of the United States Government from the sale of timber and the leasing of grazing lands; and

Whereas the Colville Indian Council is a generally uneducated body and easily led by the Indian agent and individuals working with him, and as a result the only liberal and free expenditures made to date have been for surplus administrative personnel and equipment and attorneys and lobbyists; and

Whereas the attorneys for the tribe are presently lobbying to attempt to turn over our funds for more unrestricted and consequently inefficient spending to perpetuate themselves and the bureaucracy governing the tribe; and

Whereas no constructive program has been developed for the general welfare of the rank and file of the Colville Tribe and the council under the benevolent gloved hand of steel of the agency has favored the few well-to-do Indians; and

Whereas the people have requested the council to obtain a per capita payment, and they have failed to take action, and the superintendent has refused to approve such a payment;

It is therefore necessary for the undersigned to take action by this petition for the purpose of distributing the above funds for the general benefit and welfare of the whole tribe; and therefore the undersigned hereby petition Congress to authorize the distribution of said fund by a per capita payment to the Colville Indian Tribe.

CHRISTINE WILLIAMS

PETITION

To Hon. HUGH BUTLER,
United States Senator,
Washington, D. C.:

More people are living in poverty today than when the Colville Indian Reservation was established. Hunting and fishing are negligible toward support of our people. Our economic life has been revolutionized and yet we are not allowed to buy and sell our own property. Business principles are completely ignored. Our capital resources cannot be sold and developed. People who own large tracts of timber live in a hovel but cannot sell their timber. They are forced to wait until one of the big favored lumber companies systematically cuts large tracts of timber and reaches the individual's land. Red tape and a desire to perpetuate themselves in office by members of the Indian service have not been conducive to economic development of our Indian resources.

People will not establish industry or businesses when they cannot give a long-term lease let alone a deed. We cannot develop capitalistic enterprise under Soviet-type control.

Why should we be ruled by individuals who know nothing about business?

Why are we protected by a system of theoretical benevolent paternalism?

Are we not any more capable of running our affairs than a colored or white man?

When are we going to be treated on terms of equality? When can we order a glass of beer the same as any other citizen?

It is time we were given our freedom to live unrestricted as ordinary individuals instead of living under the thumbs of small-minded souls who cannot see further than their monthly pay check.

Therefore, the undersigned respectfully petition that we be freed, given the rights, duties, and privileges of a citizen.

HARVEY ST. PAUL
(And 570 others).

Senator MURRAY. The petitions will be filed with the papers in the record for the use of the committee.

Mr. RUNNELS. We have also another petition for the rescinding of a resolution passed on the 9th day of January 1948, No. 1948-6. An additional petition is in the hands of the chairman. We ask that these petitions be made a part of the record. More petitions will be coming in also for the record. There are over 125 signatures so far on the two petitions spoken of, and this is one of them:

"PETITION TO THE CONFEDERATED TRIBES OF THE COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION

"We, the undersigned members of the Confederated Tribes of Colville Indians do hereby petition the General Tribal Council for an order and resolution repealing and rescinding resolution No. 1948-6, passed by the business council on the 9th day of January 1948.

"Under such resolution entirely too much authority and too much compensation is given the tribal clerk. We therefore further petition that all resolutions and orders whereby the tribal clerk or any other officer working under the direction of the tribe are given blanket or general authority to make or create claims or expenditures against the tribal funds, be rescinded, repealed and set aside.

"GEORGE LOUIE
"(And 33 others)."

Senator MURRAY. That may also be filed in the record.

Mr. RUNNELS. The Colville Indians want to be free from Government interference. They get along with their white neighbors and want to continue. Intermarriage is the rule rather than the exception. The result is there are more mixed-blood Indians than full-bloods. The Indian children attend public schools. In fact, we have never had an Indian school on the south half of the Colville Indian Reservation. However, they did have an Indian boarding school on the north half, at Tonasket, which burned down in 1895. There has been no Indian school on the reservation since. There is one Catholic Indian Boarding Mission at Omak, or on the Omak Creek.

On January 31, 1916, Congressman C. C. Dill, from this congressional district, had this to say:

"How long shall we continue the reservation system? We began herding Indians on reservations about 100 years ago, and are keeping them there still. Shall it never end? Those who know the Indians best condemn it. The Indians themselves, that is, those who have once gotten away from it, object to it and urge its abolition, and the others are wards and have no opportunity to know of any other system than the reservation system.

"I am informed that during the last 35 years we have appropriated $265,000,000 to carry on the present system. Are the Indians the better for it? No. Only those who have been able to get free from it have really profited by it.

"Why do we not get rid of it? I'll tell you why. There are now in the Federal Treasury between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000 of Indian trust funds. The Indian lands are worth more than a billion. As long as these funds and this property remain to be administered by Government officials who make a living by the administering, and Congress obeys the recommendations of these officials, we shall not get rid of it. The system will end only when Congress acts in the true interests of the Indian, regardless of the official recommendations which the Indian Department may make."

I am a taxpayer and many other Indians are doing the same as I am. They do not oppose to pay taxes. They feel as though they should share the burden with other citizens.

All Indians who are 65 years or over receive pensions under the laws of the State of Washington. The State welfare department is taking care of the needy, and I personally know if it had not been for this department of welfare there would be great suffering because the agency office will not do a thing for the welfare of the Indians.

Many old Indians who are receiving welfare and pensions and who own large tracts of land desire to sell their holdings so they may live properly and relieve the State from these payments, but the Indian Bureau absolutely refuses to approve of any sale, thereby cheating the State of Washington of large sums of money.

According to the last census of enrollment of the Colville Indian Reservation, the records show that there are over 3,400 Indians enrolled and the Bureau figures show that over 1,000 families live on the Colville Reservation. These figures are misleading and incorrect. I personally know every Indian family on the reservation. So do other members of the tribe who are present.

The actual number of families living within the boundaries of the Colville Reservation is 248. This figure includes men with families, as well as old men and women receiving State aid and State pensions, as well as other single persons. All of these families—it includes a large portion of this number who are farming and taking care of their own affairs without Indian Bureau supervision.

The same is true in regard to those on relief and receiving State pensions.

The Indian Bureau does nothing for these people and are not even in touch with them.

In Nespelem there are approximately 63 families. These are also independent of the Indian Bureau. They work at Coulee Dam, the lumber mills, and other gainful employment, many of whom are taxpayers and own their own homes.

There are 10 families living on the north half of the reservation, consisting of 47 persons.

In representing about 100 percent of the people living on the Colville Reservation, except Frank George and his stooges, I respectfully ask that the Indian Agency furnish a copy of the latest rolls of Indians belonging to the Colville Indian Reservation, indicating who they are and where they live.

In the enrollment of the 3,400 Indians on the Colville Indian Reservation, there are 600 or more Indians living in Canada and belonging to reservations there.

There are a large number of Indians living in Idaho who are enrolled on the Colville Reservation, as well as Indians living in other parts of the State of Washington and the world, who have no connection with the Colville Agency. My family, I have two daughters, one living in Oakland and one in Eureka, Calif., and one son in Fairbanks, Alaska. The same situation no doubt is true in other families.

In my judgment there is an Indian population on the Colville Reservation now far less than 1,500. The total number of families would be less than 325.

I notice in the hearings on Indian appropriations bill, the total population on the Colville Indian Reservation is given as 3,400, which number is misleading and inaccurate. No doubt such testimony is made to obtain large appropriations to run the Indian Agency.

We are absolutely against the so-called land purchase. We do not believe in this Communist form of ownership. We are an independent people and we want to own our property without any strings on it.

Frank George's tribal council is attempting to buy individual Indian allotments for tribal ownership, and he has bought a few. The Indian Bureau will not permit any Indian to sell his land or timber to anyone but the tribe, for large lumber companies.

The Bureau is buying up land from individuals, the Bureau making the appraisals. They pay the owner generally about half the value of the property. In addition, they charge the Indian a 10-percent commission for the sale of the lands to the Indian Bureau.

I can cite you one example. Mrs. Delia O. Lawrence, now living at Omak, Wash., about 4 months ago sold her 120-acre timber allotment to the tribe for $3,000, which price is about one-half of its value. The Indian Bureau deducted 10 percent from the purchase price, so that left Mrs. Lawrence $2,700. She signed the deed over 4 months ago and the $2,700 has not been paid yet. Not only that, the Indian Bureau advised her to borrow $700 from the bank at 8½ percent interest.

Mrs. Lawrence needed the $700 to put her children in school, and she is badly in need of the $2,700 to maintain herself and keep her children in school, but after 4 months Mrs. Lawrence is still demanding her $2,700 and is still paying the bank 8½ percent interest on the loan of $700.

No doubt there are many cases like it.

Where the 10-percent commission goes, we do not know. We respectfully ask that a statement be furnished for the record of this hearing how much land has been purchased, at what price, and the amount of commission collected from the sellers of the land; also what becomes of the commissions collected and what disposition is made of the commissions.

There are many Indians, particularly old Indians who are on old-age pensions, who are very anxious to sell their lands and timber to better their conditions but the Indian Bureau refuses to allow them to sell or issue patent in fee for their lands.

These old pensioners generally have large tracts of land and a lot of salable timber, but they live in poverty in old tumble-down shacks which are a disgrace to any civilized community. The Indian Bureau refuses to let them cut their timber for the building of homes so that they may live decently. I will cite a few cases which will demonstrate the policy which the Indian Bureau pursues.

Abraham Edwards, 74 years old, drawing old-age pension, has seven inherited allotments, each allotment containing 80 acres or more. He has tried for a long time to sell at least some of the allotments and some of the timber but the Indian Bureau refuses to sell the timber or the land. In the meantime, Mr. Edwards is living in an old shack by himself, in poverty.

Mrs. Juanita Gallaher owns a timber allotment approximately 155 acres on the San Poil River, just off State Highway No. 4. Her husband is a sawmill operator and wishes to cut the timber on this allotment but the Indian Bureau refuses. They have a family of six children. They need this timber to better their conditions.

Nespelem Charley, 75 or 80 years old, died about 2 years ago. When he died he had seven allotments lying in a block. He left only two heirs, a daughter and a grandson. He was on old-age pension when he died about 2 years ago. A long time prior to his death he tried to sell some of his timber and land but the Indian Bureau refused and made this Indian live in poverty, even though he owned property to the value of thousands of dollars. His daughter, Adeline Charley Perkins, now lives in a dilapidated shack. She has requested the Bureau to sell some of the property but the Indian Bureau has refused to loan her $500.

The estate which she has inherited from her father is easily worth more than $50,000. Yet her father died like a pauper.

Albert Jerred, about 41 years old, lives near Kewa, Wash. He has a timber allotment of about 120 to 140 acres. He works off his allotment to support his four children. The Indian Bureau will not allow him to cut his own timber to help support his children.

Cashmere Joseph, a widower, a cripple, has living with him three grandchildren. He supports himself by cutting wood and posts. He owns one allotment of 160 acres, all under cultivation, at Bridgeport, about 50 miles from where he lives. He used to receive $150 per year as rent; now he receives only $40. He wants to sell this allotment but the Indian Bureau refuses. He has four other timber allotments also, which he would like to sell so that he could make his home on lands which he owns, but the Indian Bureau refuses to be of any help to him.

Mary Gusta, 95 years old, Louie Gusta, 90 years old—both blind—and Pierre Gusta, 80 years old, are all brothers and sisters, all living together. Mary and Pierre receive State pensions. Louie did receive a pension but he sold his timber on his allotment and the proceeds from the sale were deposited in the Agency office, which is now paying $50 per month out of this fund to him. Pierre and Mary own two allotments with good timber and a little farming land. They also own a section of land in the northern half of the reservation. They have tried to sell in order that they may live decently, but the Indian Bureau refuses. These people live all together in a dilapidated house. Pierre does the shopping at Kewa about 3 miles away. The two blind people cannot take care of the stove to keep them warm so they go to bed until Pierre returns.

Madeline Timinto, 65 years of age or more, owns her own allotment and an additional two inherited allotments. She now lives in Nespelem and has built a home from proceeds received from old-age pension and insurance left by her deceased son. She cannot use the three allotments she owns and she wants to sell them so she can live comfortably at Nespelem.

Johnnie Alex Jack, Willie Quilaskin, half brothers, both receive old-age pensions. John Alex Jack is an invalid and cannot work. They live any place where they can find work. Both have valuable timber allotments but the Indian Bureau refuses to permit them to sell.

Paul Peters, 55 years old, crippled hand, blinded in one eye and the sight in the other is affected—he and his wife have allotments with timber. His wife has 200 acres of inherited land on the Flathead Reservation, Mont. The Indian Bureau will not permit them to sell their lands on the Colville Reservation or the Flathead Reservation. He has tried to get a permit to cut his own timber. The Indian office has refused him a permit. They have also tried to sell land to the tribe. This also failed. They now live in poverty and not sufficient income to live on. Their neighbors and friends help them by giving them food in order to keep them from starving.

Mary Abraham, more than 70 years old and living on a pension—she owns her husband's allotment of 140 acres in the 9-mile timber unit, which can be logged at any time as her timber land adjoins the highway. She has asked for a permit to sell her timber but the Indian Bureau has refused to give her a permit to sell her timber. She also owns land on the Spokane Reservation which she inherited from her father. This land she is renting to a white man, receiving very little rent money. She also owns an allotment inherited from her second husband, located at Nespelem. This allotment is perhaps worth $6,000. Some years ago she sold her allotment that was allotted to her to the tribe. The tribe only paid $1,200. The timber on this allotment was worth more than $1,200.

Johnnie George, about 68 years old, lives on old-age pension but owns about 800 acres of good yellow pine timber. He would like to sell some timber to live on. He is in ill health and is too old to work. The Indian Bureau refuses to allow him to sell land or timber.

William Burke, about 63 years old, is in ill health and not able to work. He also owns 80 acres on the Coeur d'Alene Reservation. He receives State aid. The Indian Bureau refuses him permission to sell any of this land on the Colville or Coeur d'Alene Reservations.

Louie David, 44 years old, single, crippled, cannot work and is receiving a GI pension. He lives at Worley, Idaho. He has three allotments of good standing timber. He is anxious to sell the timber and allotments. The Indian Bureau refuses.

Robert Bauine, living near Kewa—his wife is ill and he has four children. He owns a timber and grazing allotment of 120 acres near Twin Lakes. He is now leasing or share cropping on land belonging to the tribe. He would like to sell his own allotment, which is of no value to him. With the proceeds derived from the sale of his allotment, he would like to buy the land which he is now leasing from the tribe, but the Indian Bureau will not agree to such a deal.

Charles E. Williams has a timber allotment of 160 acres. He has made application to cut timber on his own allotment to build himself a home on a lot owned by him in Nespelem. The Bureau refuses his request. He has a wife and five children, now living in a two-room shack. He works at a sawmill at Belvidere. He also owns three allotments, in addition to the timber allotment. These three allotments are farm land, two of which are leased. His wife also owns a grazing allotment and a one-half interest in her mother's and a one-sixth interest in her father's. The Indian Bureau refuses to permit them to sell.

Joe Red Thunder owns six allotments of land, has 200 acres of good timber and also owns two allotments in Idaho or near Genesee, Idaho, and one near Craig, Idaho. Mrs. Red Thunder owns an allotment of 160 acres and 40 acres inherited from her mother, and a one-sixth interest in her father's allotment. She also owns 2.5 acres adjoining Nespelem. They have seven children, five of them now going to school. They are now living in a shack needing repair. The shack is being ruined because he cannot get lumber to build an addition or make repairs. They now are compelled to drink water from an open creek which runs by their house. The Indian Bureau refused them the privilege to cut or sell timber or sell any of their lands.

Mrs. Annie Pamolks, a widow about 80 years old, has four or more allotments. She is living alone in a two-room shack. She owns a lot of fine timber and farming land. She wants to sell at least some of her holdings in order that she may build herself a home in Nespelem. The Indian Bureau refuses to do anything about it.

Our extension agent, Earl Stinson, and his three assistants are of no value to the Colville Indians. They show favoritism to members of the tribe in issuance of the reimbursable cattle and the handling of loans. I will submit an example of Mr. Stinson's dealing with members of the tribe in 1946.

Earl Stinson called upon Joseph Nicholson, who lives near Oroville and who owns 130 acres of land which he is farming, and proposed that Nicholson sell his land to D. E. W. Neil, a white man. Nicholson did not want to sell his land. When Nicholson refused to sell his land to D. E. W. Neil, Stinson then told Nicholson that no loans would be approved and he would not get any reimbursable cattle. An application for a loan of the tribal fund was pending, and he did not receive his loan until May 1949, and through the influence of the Veterans' Bureau. But up to this time he has not received any reimbursable cattle although his application was pending for years. The agency also has refused him permission to cut lodgepoles on his own allotment. The agency also informed him that if permission is given him to cut poles on his own allotment, the proceeds from sale of the same would have to be deposited with the agency and disbursed with their approval. Mr. Nicholson is 37, is married, has a wife and two children, served in World War II, and has always handled his own affairs.

The Indian Bureau is leasing grazing lands at 10 cents per acre. We feel that in some instances the rate should be increased.

We also feel the allottee should have the privilege of leasing his own land without the supervision of the Indian Bureau.

One Parm Dixon, a sheepman, said he paid 90 cents a head for grazing on the Colville Indian Reservation for his sheep.

We, the members of the Colville Reservation, feel we should adopt the State laws. Our hunting and fishing regulations should be reserved to the Indians.

The Federal liquor laws should be repealed.

We are paying our police officers out of our tribal funds. The only arrests made are for liquor violations. One Indian alone, while he had 70 head of cattle, lost 19 head by cattle thieves. This was when William H. Head was superintendent. This is one reason why our sheriff's office could do a better job to protect our Indians.

We have been operating our own wildlife accounts since 1940, selling fishing and hunting licenses to non-Indians residing on and off the reservation. We have never had a report on this matter. This is handled by Mr. Frank George.

We are now asking that a report be made to this committee by Mr. Frank George.

We believe roads and highways should be constructed by the State. The State is doing a much better job and gets it done.

We insist that the tribe should select its attorneys instead of being selected by Frank George. The present attorney for the Tribal Council was selected by Frank George.

Our claims attorney should be selected by the tribe and not by Frank George. Time is running out and we should be working on our cases.

The contract for the cutting of timber provides for the employment of Indians. In some instances this is not complied.

In our contract with lumbering companies, they were to hire and give labor to at least 50 percent of their personnel. Upon a check of the labor personnel, it showed they hired only 4 percent.

The employment of Everett Hoagland by Frank George is done without authority from the tribe. There is not need of such an engineer, nor does the tribe need him as a lobbyist. There hasn't been any mining by the tribe at any time, nor is there any prospect of there ever being at any time.

Why don't Ferry County and Okanogan County hire him for their mining engineer? Who found all the big paying mines that were located in our United States? Certainly Mr. Mining Engineer did not discover them.

We opposed taking over by the tribe of mining leasing under Bureau control. We favor that the United States laws pertaining to mineral locations should apply.

This reservation was opened up in the year 1898 under the mining laws of 1872. We feel that there will never be any discord between Mr. Indian and Mr. White Man who may prospect for minerals on the reservation.

Why start a mining bureau on the reservation when we have a Mining Bureau in the Department of the Interior? We do not favor the leasing system. We ask that the 110,000 acres opened to mining continue as in 1893, unmolested to miners and prospectors. We ask the Northwest Mining Association and the Tri-County Mining Association to provide every effort of support to accomplish this.

We oppose the large lumber unit system. There is an abundance of ripe and overripe timber, and the timber area should be cut up into small units, and that the Indian allottee should be allowed to sell his own timber, without Indian Bureau restriction.

Any Indian logging units do not have enough timber to run them 12 months in the year. Our matured and overripe timber could cure this mistake. The sustained-yield basis was concocted by our Indian Bureau for the purpose of logging this overripe timber for the next hundred years, so we will be subject to and controlled by the Indian Bureau, who only allows the Indian loggers 10,000,000 board feet per year.

There should be a recruise of our timber to give us more employment for our Indian loggers.

All Indians who have been fortunate enough to receive a patent to their lands are now self-supporting.

We urge many more Indians should receive patents in fee to their lands so that they may make use of their assets.

We have three small irrigation projects on the reservation. They are failures. One irrigation project on the San Poil is used by one man, who irrigates about 35 acres. I doubt that his operations have justified the cost.

This project, which has only one farmer irrigating from the ditch, was supposed to be built for all the Indians that live below this project, as all the Indians living in and below this project had to sign a petition to have the Indian Bureau build the same. This project cost the Indian Bureau about $12,000 to serve one patentee Indian.

The members of the Colville Indians have a grievance against the council. In 1948 a resolution was passed for the purpose of providing a pint of milk and a sandwich for the needy Indian children. This resolution was vetoed. In its place they passed a resolution to provide $3,000 for travel expenses for one Frank George, who has bestowed on himself the rank of tribal relations officer, for the benefit of the Congress of American Indians.

While we want to be fair to all Indian children, whether they are Protestant or Catholic, if the Council can extend financial aid to the St. Mary's Mission, Wash., and Desmet, Idaho, why not practice a little gratitude at home here in Nespelem? There are about 150 Indian pupils attending school, whose parents are very much in need.

There is appropriated $8,000 to missions at Omak, Wash., and Desmet, Idaho, which is off the reservation.

The doctor at the agency is very negligent. Many Indians complain at the hospital service. The doctors change frequently; also the nurses change frequently.

Indians are permitted to visit the sick. They visit from 2 to 4 p. m., and from 7 to 8 p. m. Clinic hours are from 9 to 11:30, 5 days a week. No clinic hours on Saturday or Sunday. So, no matter how sick an Indian is, he cannot visit the clinic from Saturday to Monday, at 9 a. m.

No surgical operations are performed at the hospital. This is a 48-bed hospital.

We believe that the Indians would be better served by local medical doctors and surgeons, and the hospital should be operated in conjunction with the white people in the community.

Senator MAGNUSON, who introduced Senate bill 1021 in the Senate, to our knowledge, has never been on the Colville Reservation to consult with the tribe so we feel that he does not know enough about our reservation and our problems to be a good judge as to what our needs are, or as to what bills should be introduced, or to correct the abuses of the Indian Bureau or better our economic and social problems.

Congressman HORAN, who is urging the passage of H. R. 2432, restoring the 818,000 acres of land to the Colville Indians, has not consulted with members of the tribe as to this bill. He has, however, visited the agency and consulted with Frank George and has had his picture taken, feather-bedecked Nez Perce Indians. The Colville Indians do not dress up in feathers.

TESTIMONY OF MARCEL ARCASA

Mr. ARCASA. Yes, sir, Mr. Chairman; I have a statement here. We are not in favor of Horan and Magnuson bill, H. R. 2432, for that would put us right back into the hands of the Indian Bureau. We will not be any better off than we are at the present time. We would still be under the control of the Indian Bureau. What we are fighting for is to get away from the Indian Bureau and their steam-roller tactics. Sure, the Indian Bureau is putting up a fight to have this 818,000 acres restored to the tribe so that they can get full control of the reservation. The majority of the tribe wants their civil liberty and to be decontrolled from the Indian Bureau so that they can progress. There has not been any progress made on the Colville Reservation within the last 15 or 20 years. It is about time we are doing something about it.

A large number of Colville Indians live in old shacks, and a lot of them have land and timber but cannot sell the timber so they can build themselves good comfortable homes.

The Indian Bureau restrictions will not allow them to sell their land or timber, and a good many of the Colville Indians are getting old-age pensions from the State and relief from the county, and many of them have large timber holdings and lands. If they would let the Indians sell their timber or lands, they would take the care off the State and county, and save them a lot of money and help the Indians to be independent.

I would like to put the officials in the place of the Indian and see how they would like it. It would not be long until they would be asking for someone to help them out. That is what we are fighting for today, to better the condition of the Colville Indians.

We would like to have legislation passed so the allottee could sell the timber individually and get a good price for their timber and not have to sell it at a small price just because the Indian Bureau says so.

And about the mines, when did the Indian Bureau go into the mining business? They have made a failure in the past to induce capital to develop our mineral resources. Their job is to take care of the Indian and they have done a poor job of that, and it will be the same on the mining business.

I am in favor of the old United States mining laws to go back into effect.

We have asked Senator BUTLER for a per capita payment. The petition speaks for itself. We are not asking for a loan or appropriation. We are asking for money that belongs to the tribe, revenue derived from resources, from timber sales, and from leases. That is the only solution whereby each and every one will share and share alike.

TESTIMONY OF JIM O'BRIEN

Mr. O'BRIEN. We believe practically 100 percent of the Colville Indians are in full accord with the statement of Mr. Hiram Runnels. Our petitions with about 500 names on goes to show how the Indians are backing his statement. Also four petitions have not been collected as yet.

Senator MURRAY. And you say 100 percent of them are backing the opposition to this bill?

Mr. O'BRIEN. Practically 100 percent. I believe there was less than 1,000 Indians on the reservation and around 500 or 498 have signed it.

The Bureau of Indian Affairs stinks.

We wish to thank this committee for making it possible for penetrating the iron curtain of the Indian Bureau. In the past the officials from Washington who come out to learn our conditions come to the Indian Agency and gets all information there, and goes no further, and tells the people everything is lovely with the Indians.

Our mineral resources lie dormant on account of Indian Bureau restrictions. We have a lot of timber and land-poor Indians on account of Indian Bureau restrictions. Business principles are ignored in handling our affairs. We don't want the Indian Bureau to handle our mining resources.

The Indian Bureau's handling of our mineral resources is a complete failure. If the white man can progress under United States mining laws, we can progress too.

As to our timber resources, large companies have been favored and the small Indian loggers have been ignored. My information is that prices paid for Indian timber is much less than prices paid for national forest timber.

European dictators have compared our Indian reservations to concentration camps. Stalin, the greatest dictator of all time, has nothing on our Indian Bureau. I wonder what Patrick Henry, the famous patriot, would think or say if he were alive today and saw the Colville Indians living under a dictatorship and trying to get their liberty. Our Indian boys fought two world wars for the liberty of the white man, I guess. We wonder how many more world wars the Indians will have to fight in order to get their own liberty.

The white man has beer parlors and clubs for recreation, but the Indians have the bootleg system which was a failure among the white people.

Congress should abolish the Indian Bureau with its dictatorial powers and police-state tactics and incompetent business methods.

A lot of us Indians are taxpayers. We protest to Congress appropriating our tax money for a needless Indian Bureau.

We fail to see where Frank George and his Congress of American Indians have helped the Colville Indians. Only Frank George has helped himself to our tribal funds.

As to per capita payment, the petition speaks for itself. We can put this money to better use by all the people rather than being dissipated by Frank George and his stooges.

The Colville Indians want to be free from the Indian Bureau. The State pays the Indians old-age pensions as well as the needy.

SUGGESTIONS AS TO SOLUTION OF AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, there has been much discussion in this Chamber within recent days on the proposition of attaining a foreign policy which can be widely supported by a united America. A broad variety of opinion has been disclosed, and we are all sifting the many alternatives which are the product of profound deliberations. We are all deeply sincere in a desire for peace, yet we are honestly compelled to the view that the Russian Empire desires armed conflict with the free world. The Politburo will apparently not feel secure until Russian imperialism dominates the world. We will have no real security until the war machine of Communist imperialism is overwhelmingly exceeded by the might of the free nations.

I am not endeavoring to reach a solution today to the problem of a workable foreign policy for this country. Instead, I want to urge upon my colleagues convictions of mine which I earnestly hope will be some of the elements on which that solution will be based.

First, I should like to speak of the spirit in which we will approach the development of an ultimate policy. In my opinion, there has never been a period within our history in which it has been more necessary for our public servants, both civil and military, to be utterly frank and realistic. We are in conflict with a godless horde that knows no honor, a horde that is brutal and vicious. We have witnessed the operation of Russian imperialism in the conquering of many nations, an operation that has displayed all the cunning devices which take advantage of human nature—broken promises, deceit, class hatred, suspicion, all these allied with application of brute force on weakened peoples. Any vestige of Victorian diplomacy which exists today must be abandoned in our dealings with the Russians and their satellites. We must depart from the policy of the striped pants and the soft gray gloves, and face up to the fact that the Marquis of Queensbury rules are a handicap when the Russians are in the ring. The intelligence experts of the free world should be fully supported in programs to encourage resistance to Russian domination, and supplies useful to organized resistance must be slipped into the hands of the oppressed. We must strike the soft under belly of communism at every point open to attack.

Another factor in the development of a foreign policy requires a positive indication that the nations whom we regard as allies are ready and willing to extend themselves to the fullest of their abilities. All nations desiring to remain free from Communist domination must act quickly to train armies and to obligate their economies to the maximum in the production of munitions and supplies. The other free nations will have to maintain control over the Communists within their borders, and all within the free orbit must, as of this moment, abandon trading in any markets which supply or aid the Russian imperialists. Honesty compels us to write off any nation which fails to achieve these prerequisites.

Today we are heavily in debt from a war which, it was hoped, would bring to the world a long and prosperous peace. We are daily becoming more heavily indebted, and the Eighty-second Congress is obligated to achieve maximum efficiency out of every dollar spent on our military and domestic programs. The magnitude of defense preparations can never be allowed to make economies, however small, appear trifling, and the succeeding generations who inherit the burdens of these costly times deserve every dollar we can save them. I intend, at a later time, to call attention to specific items which I believe we can erase from the President's budget.

For the present, I believe our best military minds should be devoted to the proposition of effectively utilizing the armed strength that can be obtained from the Chinese Nationalists, the Japanese, and the western Germans. We deserve whatever allies are capable and willing to meet the common enemy. It is pitiful that we have not been properly supported in Korea by the other members of the United Nations, and it seems apparent that the Korean incident was a carefully calculated trap to employ American military strength far from home and farther from Europe. I sincerely believe we should abandon the Korean excursion.

While there has been much discussion about the power of the President to send troops to Western Europe, I will strongly support the resolution recently introduced in the Senate which proposes consent of the Congress prior to sending our troops abroad. Regardless of the legal aspect of this issue, the President's desire for unity in the Congress will be handsomely served if he seeks congressional approval for such a move. We all desire unity of purpose, but members of the minority are mindful of the fact that cooperation is a two-way road. The memory of Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam is too firmly fixed in our minds to accept the thesis that the President's prerogatives cannot be exercised erroneously.

I am deeply sincere when I state that I believe the unity of purpose which must be achieved in developing a foreign policy suited to these times will be materially benefitted by the resignation of Secretary Acheson. While there have been many attempts to designate any disapproval of Secretary Acheson as mere politics, I am convinced that the vast majority of our people do not hold him in the esteem and respect which his highly important office deserves in this critical period. Secretary Acheson is flavored with a reputation for fuzzy thinking which he rightfully earned in recent years in supporting policies which are now almost universally repudiated. Any loyalty which Secretary Acheson deserves from the President is less to be regarded than the convictions of those people whom I believe to be in the vast majority.

While I have commented specifically on some of the issues which I believe are important to the formulation of foreign policy, my main purpose has been to urge my colleagues to consider matters relating to foreign policy with absolute realism. I am sure all of us realize that Stalin is not "good old Joe," and that what he represents is a crafty and godless force bent upon subjugation of the free world. I am firmly convinced that our relations with other free nations call for the application of a frank and honest appraisal of their conduct in whatever alliance comes into being. Our friends will soon have to stand up and be counted, and our efforts in their behalf must be measured by their own efforts.

THE INTERNATIONAL SITUATION—AMERICAN DIPLOMATIC AND MILITARY POLICIES

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, the time is at hand for epochal decisions by the Government of the United States which may change the whole course of civilization. It is not surprising, then, that the President has urged Members of Congress to debate fully the impending questions which soon must be settled. Neither is it surprising that each succeeding mail from Colorado and all other States is loaded with more and more pertinent inquiries as to just what is planned. These letters reflect not only great anxiety and concern at the grass roots, but considerable feeling and solid convictions for or against proposed diplomatic and military policies which may or may not be adopted. Distrust and disunity are the order of the day.

I am not an economist, a constitutional lawyer, a diplomat, or a military expert. This is not going to be that kind of a speech. But I have seen our country drift into two World Wars, and I have followed every move on every front in our ever-increasing drift into world war III. Therefore, I shall discuss the present situations which face the United States and the diplomatic and military proposals that are being considered or advocated by our duly elected and selected officials, as a Senator without commitment or obligation of any nature to any one other than what I deem to be best for the American people. Others may know much more about these questions than I, but no one has worried more about them or tried harder to evaluate them.

I have listened to many suggestions that national unity is the most important consideration. I disagree. The important thing is that we adopt the right policy. Already there has been too much "me-too-ism," flag-waving, and blind, slavish, rubber-stamp acquiescence.

Korea today represents the focal point of our whole international and military policy and, therefore, the situation there is naturally the first to be explored. This far-away and relatively unimportant little country will teach us many vital lessons if we give heed. Certainly it points up a whole multitude of errors in both the diplomatic and military fields. Out of our bitter experience in Korea I pray may come forth a plan for our survival in this mixed-up world. To us, it has no other military value in any degree. Nor has it any economic significance to us. Always we have held its people in the highest regard. Traditionally, our sympathy has been with them in their long, hard struggles for economic and political freedom.

In the closing days of World War II, we invited our ally, Russia, to assist us in Manchuria and Korea. When the war ended, we recognized Russia's interest in Korea by arbitrarily dividing this unfortunate country at the thirty-eighth parallel into Northern and Southern Korea. I do not think we consulted the Koreans, or anyone else, for that matter, about this very ill-considered and arbitrary action. We just did it as a cheap and easy way to indicate our wholehearted spirit of cooperation in the Orient with Joseph Stalin. Russia assumed a sort of trusteeship over the northern section, while we did the same thing for that portion of the peninsula lying south of the thirty-eighth parallel.

North Korea is blessed with a wealth of natural resources, especially minerals, timber, and hydroelectric power, while South Korea is almost entirely agricultural. Nearly all of the industrial plants are in North Korea. One-third of the Koreans live in the north and two-thirds in the south. The economic independence and prosperity of these people depend upon the unification of the two zones and the elimination of the imaginary barrier plucked out of the ozone by us. The Koreans, both north and south, are a mild, friendly, industrious, patient, and hopeful people, accustomed through the centuries to cruel oppression by their neighbors.

Russia indoctrinated her section with communism, coupled with military training, and we sold our kind of democracy to South Korea without teaching them how to defend their ideals against possible aggression. They, being peaceable people, were not particularly interested in military education, and we did not bother to insist on its necessity. We were forewarned repeatedly that the Communists in the north were planning a military attack on South Korea, but apparently disdainfully ignored such reports. In due course, Russia and the United States withdrew their respective armies of occupation. Shortly thereafter, civil war broke out in Korea. The North Koreans crossed the thirty-eighth parallel into South Korea on June 25, 1950, in an effort to unite by force all Korea under the Communist banner. Their well-trained armies, splendidly equipped with World War II guns and tanks, made steady advances against the weak and helpless and poorly equipped South Koreans.

On June 27 at 12 noon the President ordered United States sea and air forces to "give Korean Government troops cover and support." June 30 the President stated that he had authorized General MacArthur to use land forces. Congress was in session at the time, but was not asked to declare war or authorize troop movement to Korea. On June 27 at 10:45 p. m., nearly 11 hours after we had entered the war, the Security Council of the United Nations requested its members to supply the Republic of Korea with assistance to repel the invasion. The Associated Press reported, July 1, 1950, that United States troops were being flown to Korea in numbers.

Thus we entered the war in Korea. This worst diplomatic and military disaster in American history was conceived in cockiness and born in recklessness. Aside from the hocus-pocus about the thirty-eighth parallel, we had the identical provocation to get into the civil war in China. There, as in Korea, northern Communist forces were invading southern territory. But we stayed out. I think we were prudent to do so. I rejoice that we did so. But the point is, the principles involved in the civil war in China and civil war in Korea were identical. We were wise enough to keep out of one, but jumped into the other lightning quick. The only real difference in the two wars was the respective military strength of each conflagration. Millions of men were involved in China and only thousands—so we thought—in Korea. Are there two kinds of aggression—big aggression and little aggression? And is little aggression more offensive to our sense of international rectitude? What other explanation is there for the inconsistency of our policies in these two instances?

We have made Korean soil the battleground for our quarrel with communism. South Korea as a part of the free world is one thing, but as a battlefield is something else. We stated that it was our purpose to liberate the South Koreans, but our efforts on their behalf have almost obliterated them instead. Three times already the United Nations and Communist fighting forces have engaged in a running battle across the Korean peninsula, and another bloody and devastating campaign is now under way. Both sides have indulged the scorched-earth technique. The flight of South Korean refugees, in snow and sleet and storm, pushing their hand carts along the highways and carrying their worldly possessions on their heads and backs, fleeing for their very lives from their homes, is one of the most tragic migrations in history. Regardless of our good intentions, this is what our military intervention has done to these unfortunate human beings. Their misery cannot be measured or described. How many casualties they have suffered will never be known.

Our intervention in Korea is fanning the fires of race hatred in the Far East, too. Nothing could be worse for world peace on a long-range basis than that. Nothing carries a greater danger potential to future world understanding than this tricky factor of race hatred. Our enemies would like to set the orientals against us. We must see to it that they do not succeed in their program of inciting bitter race hatred which one day may develop into the most terrible world war of all times. Historically and actually, the United States has been friendly to oriental people, but not all white men have earned that reputation. It is very easy in these circumstances to kindle race hatred against the United States. For some years, there has been a movement to drive the white man out of Asia. That is one of the most serious aspects of our present war. That is one of the very good reasons why we should not intervene in China. That is one of the most realistic reasons why we should have kept out of Korea.

If Korea has not taught the United States an extraordinary lesson in the supreme importance of military intelligence, then our days as a mighty world power are numbered. In this time of perfected espionage and scouting from the sky, there is no excuse for the lack of information or the erroneous information which was dished up to our troops who were engaged there. Fatal surprise after fatal surprise has embarrassed our generals and added unnecessarily to our casualty lists. It is difficult to believe that military intelligence could have deteriorated to such an alarming extent in five short years. Perhaps it took a Korea to demonstrate how pitifully weak is the status of this all-important branch of our national defense.

The first rule of military action is not to underestimate the power of the enemy. The second rule is to equip one's own fighters with the best and most lethal weapons an alert science can provide. We have been waving an empty pistol in Korea too much of the time. Science developed a big bazooka many months ago which could have destroyed the powerful North Korean tanks without trouble, but our first troops who were ordered to repel these tanks had none of these superior weapons. These soldiers had to use hand grenades to stop the deadly Russian tanks; and that kind of hand-combat warfare cost many precious American lives.

The United States spent many billions developing an atomic bomb. This celebrated weapon is supposed to be effective in the superlative degree against heavy concentration of troops, but it was not tried out in Korea, even though we are supposed to have quantities of them in cold storage. Leading with weakness has never won recognition as good battle strategy. American soldiers should never be sent into battle with one arm tied behind them. Whether to use or not to use an atomic bomb in Korea ought to be a military problem, but we have delegated this decision to the politicians in the United Nations organization. That is pretty sad.

Press reports from the Korean war front have indicated that American soldiers have been outnumbered 5 or 10 or even 20 to 1 in almost every battle. Perhaps that could not be helped in the first few weeks, when we were trying to put backbone in the South Korean Army overnight, but the war is now in its seventh month. Today the United States has 2,300,000 men in uniform. Why is it necessary for a handful of men to do all the fighting in Korea? And if we cannot get more men there, why do we not do our fighting in a locale of our own choosing, with a shortened perimeter in keeping with our strength? These are some of the unanswered questions which cause so much feeling of frustration in America today.

We call our forces in Korea the United Nations forces. Perhaps they are United Nations forces. In the west we have a legendary character who boasts about his 50-50 horse and rabbit sausage—1 horse and 1 rabbit. United Nations officials did call on all its members to send troops to MacArthur, but few of them responded. Those who did, excepting the United States, sent merely a token force. I do not criticize any nation for using discretion in deploying its military men in this manner. I think they were far wiser than we. But they have effectively exploded the idea that the United Nations can conduct a war.

Collective security is a wonderful theory, but Korea has demonstrated that collective security cannot be turned off and on like a spigot by the United Nations. If nations are vitally interested in the particular war which is raging they will participate; otherwise they will not. Most of them have been too smart to be sucked into the quicksands of Asiatic intrigue in Korea and China. The United Nations, as well as the United States, ought to learn much from the experience in Korea.

We have one of two choices: Either we should put a huge force in Korea, fully equipped and supplied with the most modern and the most lethal weapons science can device, and give them full air and sea support, or we should get our forces out and charge our dismal failure there to bitter experience. Halfway military measures cost lives and do not win wars. Three weeks ago, in a telephone message to a mass meeting in Boulder, Colo., I coined the phrase "all out or get out." These five short words express what I think our policy should be.

Our policy makers say we must remain in Korea to save face. To me, it is more important for us to save the lives of our GI's than the red faces of our discredited policy makers. Unless we are prepared to carry on a full-scale war in Korea, we must extricate ourselves from the struggle as best we can, or continue to dribble away the precious lives of American youth without any military achievement. When our troops departed from the Hungnam beachhead some days ago, a GI spoke for America when he wrote these immortal words on a billboard at the point of debarkation, "We didn't want the damn place anyhow."

The people of the United States did hope that Japan might adopt pacifism as its way of life, but in Asia such a role is extremely dangerous today for any people. I am loath to say this, but in my opinion conversion to military strength cannot proceed too rapidly in Japan. The whole Far East is becoming more warlike by the hour, and wars and rumors of wars are breaking out all over the place, so it behooves Japan to rearm for its own protection. It is up to us, therefore, to reverse our attitude toward our former enemies and assist them to get in position to protect and defend their own firesides. All Communists there should be rounded up and placed in concentration camps. In due course, they might be deported to China, Korea, or Siberia for close communion with their beloved fellow Reds. In that case, methinks something which is not pretty would soon happen to them.

Formosa does form an important link in our Far East line of defense, and the Communists must be kept out. Whether Chiang could launch a successful military offensive against the Chinese mainland from Formosa is a serious question, but I am speaking of Formosa as a defense bastion only, and not as a base for continental invasion.

Personally, I should like nothing better than to keep the United States out of world war III, but bitter experience has taught me that it cannot be done. The day the Russian aggressor crosses the line into Western Germany on his way to Western Europe, he will be at war with the United States. Make no mistake about that. It is as certain as that there will be a tomorrow. The American Government and the American people will never tolerate aggression into these areas. Neither Wilhelm nor Hitler thought the United States would fight in Europe, or, if they would fight, that they could be effective. That was their major military blunder. No such illusion should prevail in Moscow, or even in any segment of our own population. If Russian military forces move against Western Europe, the United States will be at her throat instantly. I am not advocating this, nor am I urging it. I am merely stating what every well-informed American in his heart knows will happen. I pray that the Politburo comprehends this fact thoroughly. I doubt that America and her allies can successfully invade and conquer Russia with a huge land army, but I do know that we can destroy every city in Russia and set her progress back 100 years. The American people and the American Government do not want such an unspeakable catastrophe to happen to any city or any people. They have rejected and will continue to reject a preventive war, but they will not run from any military violation of Western Europe.

Field Marshal Stalin has seen, as have I, the devastation and ruins of Berlin. The stacks of rubble and twisted steel stand there a mute but eloquent monument to the wrath of war. If the generalissimo contemplates a program of military conquest of the west, I hope he does not think for one split second that any city in Russia will suffer less than did Berlin. To appease Russia is as dangerous as waving a red flag at a bull, but tirades of abuse and name calling are almost as bad since everyone identifies such antics as evidence of frustration and an inferiority complex. But we ought to make it plain at what point we will fight.

It is only sanity, therefore, that the United States assist Western Europe to defend itself. I did not say that the United States should defend Europe; I said, "Assist Western Europe to defend itself." There is a vast difference between the two. I hope General Eisenhower may be given wide discretionary authority and power to plan for the defense of Western Europe. We do not want him to build a Maginot Line or permit a Maginot Line psychology to develop. We want General Eisenhower to build a modern, integrated army of well-trained, well-equipped men, mobile and supported by the greatest armada of fighting airships the world has ever seen, ready to strike at a moment's notice.

It would be the most tragic mistake in history if the United States undertook even the major part of such a defense alone. America cannot guarantee every European and Asiatic principality against aggression. Insofar as we are able, keeping paramount our own legitimate interests and American security, we ought to assist those who wage wars on aggressors. But all such self-serving propaganda expressions as "in our own enlightened self-interest," "global responsibility," "peace-loving nations," and other similar high-powered indoctrination shibboleths, should be left to our enemies to utter critically.

Western Europe cannot be defended unless deep in its heart it wants to defend itself. From what I have seen first hand and from what I have been able to learn from other first-hand observers, the people in Western Europe do not think war is imminent, and thus are very calm and complacent about the whole thing. The French are far more afraid of the military resurgence of Germany than they are of an attack by Russia. France and Italy are teeming with communism, but even non-Communists in those countries do not seem to worry much about Russia. The working classes and the poor are having a difficult time balancing their family budgets, with prices high and wages low. Capital is scarce and at a destructive premium. In France and Italy the rich are growing richer, and the poor, poorer. Little wonder that capitalism is on the defensive.

Western Germany is the most pacifist country in the world today. Eking out a miserable existence amid the ruins of demolished cities is very depressing. Switzerland is looking after her internal defenses most effectively. She could and would whip her weight in wildcats, in acting against any invader; but I do not believe she would send one man across her borders to fight for the defense of any other country. Belgium and Holland are dragging their feet in military matters. Norway did not like German occupation in World War II, and will make a fight of it, and can be depended upon to do everything in her power to defend all Western Europe against totalitarian aggressors.

Sweden is building her defense methodically, has some capacity to wage war, and will fight if her neutrality is violated. Denmark will do what she can. Spain is very hard up, but she will make a dependable contribution against communism if assisted, and the same is true of Portugal. Greece has a small army, but a good one; and Turkey is very well prepared to defend her own country. Great Britain will do her fair share, as will her far-flung commonwealth of nations. It is noticeable that these nations want strength, not to wage war, but for diplomatic negotiations on behalf of peace. It is reassuring that these prudent, sincere, and rational people, who are as much devoted to the essential freedoms as are we, are not bombastic and are not defying anyone to knock the chip off their shoulder in this gloomy moment in history.

There are extreme poverty, hardships of every description, and much unemployment in both Eastern and Western Germany. I am absolutely certain that if General Eisenhower were authorized to do so, he could raise an army of a million carefully screened volunteer recruits in Germany and Austria. Making it a strictly volunteer enlistment would obviate approval by the governments of Eastern or Western Germany. Since it would not be official German Government action, France should not object. After all, there is no better soldier than the German—except, of course, the American GI. Such a program would relieve the manpower shortage in the United States, and would do more toward defending and unifying Western Europe than anything else that has been proposed heretofore.

Several have suggested that the ratio of American strength in Europe be held to 1 to 6. That would be a most generous contribution on our part; and anyone who complains about it could not have in mind the best interest of the United States or of the world, in my opinion. Should America contribute more than 1 to 6, the reaction at home would be very bad, and the effect on the morale of Europe would be disastrous. Europe does not want to be placed in the contemptible position of a kept mistress.

Let us keep this fact constantly before us: Unless the countries of Western Europe show more enthusiasm for their own defenses than appears on the surface today, they will be a push-over for Russia, in spite of all that the United States can do. It is up to them. We had better not have any more of the brand of collective security which was demonstrated in Korea.

It is good military strategy to have a second line of defense ready to fall back to. Former President Hoover presented a sound one recently, except that he should have included Spain and Portugal in it. We could defend that line against communism for 100 years, and we should proceed to do so unless Western Europe assumes a more realistic and energetic interest in its own defenses. If the world wants our military and economic leadership, we ought to accept the challenge. But if the other countries want us to provide both the leadership and the "followship" and pay the whole bill ourselves, we ought to tell them to go jump in the lake. No self-respecting people will continue to respect us if we furnish everything. Equal sacrifice and equal interest must be the objective. There is just as much danger in doing too much as in doing too little. Taking part without taking over should be our aim.

Western Europe has the most cultured, enlightened, and talented people on earth. It is the cradle and the domicile of civilization. For most Americans it is the fatherland. We must not forget that the people in Europe are proud people, who understand far better than we what constitutes decent equities as between sovereign powers. We ruined the American Indian by making him our ward. Let us stop now our ward concept for Europe. If we demand that they do their full share, they will respect us; if we assume too much in their behalf, they will hold us in utter contempt. That is human nature.

America's eagerness to bleed for all the world is looked upon with suspicion and disgust everywhere. There are "sucker" nations, just as there are "suckers" in private life. Uncle Sam will deserve to have no friends if he continues to play the role of "Uncle Sap." Does anyone on this earth have the slightest particle of respect for a "sap"?

When I was in Europe last fall, many little people with whom I visited expressed the hope that the United States and Russia would compose their differences, and would not drag them into war as the result of our running quarrel. The situation is not quite that simple, but they are wise in not wanting their countries to become the battleground in the impending titanic struggle between these two great powers. They have seen the misery in Korea, and they do not want to be driven in the night from their homes and see the torch set to their proud cities. They know that modern war calls for a policy of scorched earth, and that it would be a heartbreaking ordeal for them. In Georgia Sherman is still the symbol of ruthless destruction.

I wish to say one word about the United Nations. I am stronger for this organization today than ever, but my concept of the way it should function has undergone a complete about-face since our experience in Korea. Once I thought the United Nations had to have police power and a police force to make every nation toe the mark. I no longer think it can be made the custodian of collective security or can wage war. If it attempts to exercise such a power, I am convinced it will destroy itself, and thereby will endanger the peace of the world.

The United Nations must remain a world forum where Austin and Vishinsky may sit across the table and glare and bellow at each other on behalf of their respective nations to meet afterward in social functions the best of personal friends. The world needs that sort of things desperately. Somehow I feel that the steam let off at Lake Success and in New York has brought the whole world much closer together. To see ourselves as others see us is bitter but potent medicine. The time is almost here when no nation will want to be singled out by its neighbors as a violator of decent conduct. Not the fear of sanctions, reparations, reprisals, and military action, but the regard for the good opinion of one's fellows will tend to keep bad international conduct in check. Nations, as in the case of individuals crave good and honored names.

The United States has three very dangerous enemies—communistic aggression, inflation, and militarism. The three are closely related. Stalin's greatest ally in the present crisis is our rapid progress toward inflation. Most of the suffering in Western Europe today is the result of pernicious and uncontrolled inflation and of bad monetary practices. Inflation is growing by leaps and bounds, day by day in America. Every dollar of deficit spending increases its intensity and its threat to the American capitalistic system. Controls can be invoked and will act as palliatives to hold the line temporarily, but they are not a cure. Soon the black market and the gray market will become organized and under way, and the law of supply and demand will operate under the counter again. An arms race is thoroughly bad, largely because it promotes inflation, but in a period of world-wide nervous frustration, such as we are passing through, we must have rearmament. The point I desire to make is that we should be as moderate and as sensible as possible in the present crisis. We should undertake only those things we can do well, and restrain our over-zealous countrymen who want to build Rome in a day. We can mobilize 3,500,000 men, and train, arm, and equip them as no army has ever been trained and equipped before; we can provide a sizable lend-lease program to other nations who are ready to oppose aggression, and still have economic conditions only 25 percent off normal. For a long-range program, such sensible moderation is absolutely essential.

We should strive strenuously, therefore, to keep the impact of the mobilization on our economy as moderate as possible, so that we may keep our program continuous for 100 years, if that length of time be necessary. In the present crisis, I suppose we must open the money bags in the Treasury to the military leaders of the Republic, and try diligently to replenish those bags out of current taxes. At the same time, let us restrain all Government agencies, including the military, against reckless waste and domestic improvements which can be postponed, and urge them to demand only their barest necessities. This cold war may well last a century. We had better conserve our wind, so that we may remain in this race to the tape. Falling in battle is little worse than falling by the roadside exhausted from trying to do too much too soon.

Summing up my views in this historic debate, I suggest that we get out of Korea as soon as it is feasible to do so; that we rearm Japan; that we keep our powder dry in Formosa; and that we review carefully and deliberate long and seriously our long-range policy in Asia.

I stand ready to vote to authorize the President to dispatch a limited number of troops to Western Europe. I would hold the ratio of our contribution to not over 1 to 6 for the present.

My most important proposal, however, is to enlist in our Army a million volunteer and carefully screened fighting men from Austria, East and West Germany, Poland, and Czechoslovakia. I would pay these soldiers well and after 5 years of satisfactory military service make them eligible for migration to the United States.

I send to the desk for appropriate reference a bill for this purpose, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 609) to provide for the enlistment in the Regular Army of certain aliens, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That (a) the Secretary of the Army is authorized until June 30, 1955, to accept original enlistments and reenlistments in the Regular Army, for periods of not less than 5 years, of not more than 1,000,000 qualified male aliens who are nationals of East or West Germany, Poland, or Czechoslovakia and who are not less than 18, or more than 35, years of age at the time of their original enlistments. No person shall be enlisted or reenlisted pursuant to this section until it has been determined after careful investigation that such person will render loyal service to the United States and will not constitute a questionable risk from the standpoint of the national security of the United States and its Armed Forces.

(b) Persons enlisted in the Regular Army pursuant to this section—

(1) shall receive, while so serving, the pay and allowances provided by law for other enlisted members of the Regular Army, except that they shall not be entitled to receive the additional pay provided by section 206 of the Career Compensation Act of 1949 (Public Law 351, 81st Cong.) for persons on duty in any place beyond the continental limits of the United States or in Alaska; and

(2) shall not by reason of such service become eligible for retirement under any provision of law, to receive any benefit under any of the laws administered by the Veterans' Administration, or to qualify for any other benefit provided by law for citizens of the United States on account of their performance of service in the Army of the United States.

(c) The Secretary of the Army is authorized to prescribe such regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions of this section, as he shall deem necessary to carry its provisions into effect.

SEC. 2. (a) No provision of law prohibiting the payment of any person not a citizen of the United States shall apply to any person enlisted in the Regular Army pursuant to this act, or to any dependent or beneficiary of any such person with respect to any payment to which such dependent or beneficiary may become entitled by reason of the service of such enlisted person.

(b) That portion of section 2 of the act approved August 1, 1894 (28 Stat. 216, as amended; 10 U. S. C. 625) which reads "; and in time of peace no person (except an Indian) who is not a citizen of the United States or who has not made legal declaration of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, shall be enlisted for the first enlistment in the Army" is hereby suspended until June 30, 1955, with respect to enlistments made under this act.

SEC. 3. (a) Each person who has completed 5 years of satisfactory service under an enlistment contracted pursuant to this act and who has been honorably discharged from such enlistment, and the wife and each unmarried minor child of such person shall—

(1) upon his application made therefor within 1 year after the termination of his service under such enlistment, be eligible for admission into the United States for permanent residence; and

(2) may be naturalized as citizens of the United States upon compliance with the requirements therefor prescribed by law.

(b) The Secretary of State, the Attorney General, and the Secretary of the Army shall, after consultation, promulgate jointly or severally such regulations as they may deem necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this section.

CITATION OF JOSEPH DOTO FOR CONTEMPT

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, by direction of the Special Committee to Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce, I submit a privileged report (S. Rept. No. 25) and a resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONG in the chair). The report will be received, and printed, and the resolution will be read by the clerk.

The resolution (S. Res. 43) was read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate certify the report of the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate as to the refusal of Joseph Doto to answer a series of questions before the said special committee, together with all the facts in connection therewith, under the seal of the United States Senate, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said Joseph Doto may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I think perhaps there should be a quorum call at this point, in order that all Senators may have an opportunity to hear what the Senator from Tennessee has to say. In fact, a quorum call may be required. I do not wish to suggest the absence of a quorum unless it is agreeable to the Senator from Tennessee. I do not object to the Senator from Tennessee proceeding. It is perfectly agreeable to me to have the matter brought up at this time.

Mr. O'CONOR. Reserving the right to object, I should like to say, if the Senator from Tennessee will permit, that I agree with the suggestion made by the Senator from Nebraska, and, realizing the importance of the question which is about to be presented by the Senator from Tennessee, I think it would be in order to suggest the absence of a quorum. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hayden	Martin
Bennett	Hendrickson	Millikin
Benton	Hennings	Monroney
Brewster	Hickenlooper	Morse
Bridges	Hill	Mundt
Butler, Md.	Hoey	Murray

Green	Malone	Young

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think we should have an explanation of what we are being asked to do.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I was seeking recognition to explain the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I am wondering whether I could ask the Senator from Tennesseee how long he expects to take in his presentation of the resolution.

Mr. KEFAUVER. So far as I am concerned, it should not take more than 5 minutes.

On December 12, pursuant to a subpena which was duly served, Joe Doto, alias Joe Adonis, of New Jersey, appeared before the Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce. The hearing was held at Washington, and a quorum of the committee was present. Joe Doto, alias Joe Adonis, was asked certain questions. He refused to answer a great many of the questions. It is on his refusal to answer the questions that the citation for contempt is asked. I should like to read some of the questions which the witness refused to answer:

Mr. HALLEY. Were you in the bootlegging business before the repeal of prohibition?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer that question.

The CHAIRMAN. You are directed to answer.

Mr. DOTO. On the ground that it might incriminate me, I decline to answer.

He was asked what business he was in.

Mr. DOTO. None at the present.

Mr. HALLEY. None at the present? What was your last business?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer.

* * * * * *

Mr. HALLEY. What was your last legitimate business?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer.

* * * * * *

Mr. HALLEY. Are you still connected with the Automotive Conveying Co., of New Jersey?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer.

Mr. HALLEY. Do you know what the Automotive Conveying Co., of New Jersey, is?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer.

* * * * * *

Mr. HALLEY. I refer to a company located at 208 Gorge Road, Cliffside Park, N. J., known as the Automotive Conveying Co.; have you ever heard of it?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer.

* * * * * *

Mr. HALLEY. Is not the business of that company the conveying of Ford automobiles from the Ford plant in Edgewater, N. J., to various places throughout the East?

Mr. DOTO. Are you finished?

Mr. HALLEY. That is the question.

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer.

* * * * * *

Mr. HALLEY. Do you know Frank Costello?

Mr. DOTO. Yes.

* * * * * *

Mr. HALLEY. Have you ever done any business with him?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer.

He was asked about Saratoga Springs and whether he had ever been to the Piping Rock Casino there. He said he had been there.

Mr. HALLEY. Did you ever see gambling in progress at the Piping Rock Casino?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer.

Mr. HALLEY. Did you ever see any people other than yourself gambling at Piping Rock Casino?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer.

* * * * *

Mr. HALLEY. Have you ever had any business connection or affiliation with the Arrowhead Inn?

The Arrowhead Inn is a place at Saratoga Springs.

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer.

Mr. HALLEY. Is it not a fact that you, during the years 1947, 1948, were affiliated with the Arrowhead Inn in Saratoga Springs?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer.

He was asked about his income.

Senator WILEY. Does any of it come from dope peddling?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer.

* * * * *

Senator WILEY. Does any of it come from organized prostitution?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON. Did the witness at any time prior to his refusal to answer specific questions state the reason for his refusal to answer by claiming his constitutional privilege?

Mr. KEFAUVER. He claimed the constitutional privilege that to answer the questions would tend to incriminate him.

Mr. FERGUSON. Did he claim the privilege before the Senator from Tennessee asked the questions? In other words, did he rely on his constitutional privilege to cover all questions?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The way it came about was that he declined to answer the first few questions which were asked of him. His attorney was present. The record shows that his attorney was present at the hearing. However, his attorney declined to sit with the witness, and the witness did not want his attorney to sit with him. Approximately in the middle of the questioning of the witness he read a statement. He said:

I wish to state clearly why I feel I should assert and rely upon my constitutional privileges to refuse to be a witness against myself.

Thereupon, he read a statement in which he claimed his constitutional privilege to decline to answer all questions about anyone he knew, whether he had done any business with any person, whether he had been to certain places, whether he had heard about certain companies, and so forth. I can go on for many pages to show the type of questions he refused to answer.

Some of the questions related to transactions which had occurred from 10 to 15 years ago, and whether he knew of the existence of certain companies.

Mr. FERGUSON. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is the purpose of the present resolution to cite the witness for contempt of the Senate and to punish him?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Its purpose is to refer the matter to the district attorney for the purpose of prosecuting the witness for contempt.

Mr. FERGUSON. It is not for the purpose of having the Senate itself punish the witness. Its purpose is merely to refer the matter to the district attorney?

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is correct.

Mr. FERGUSON. Has the Senator from Tennessee conferred with the Attorney General with respect to this subject in order to ascertain whether the witness could be prosecuted under recent decisions of the Supreme Court dealing with the refusal of a witness to answer certain questions?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Does the Senator refer to the other section of the code under which the Attorney General can proceed by presenting the case to the grand jury without the Senate first taking action?

Mr. FERGUSON. Does the Senator believe that there is any difference, so far as the constitutional provision is concerned, between answering questions before a Senate committee and answering questions before a court or a grand jury? Has the Senator from Tennessee gone into the law, and will he give to the Senate the legal decisions and the distinctions, if there are any, before we pass on the resolution? I desire to aid in every way I can to assure that answers will be given to the questions, and I want the Senator to have full hearing of the subject, but I feel that we ought to be fully advised as to whether or not a constitutional privilege exists in this case.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The law provides that such a matter may be referred to the Senate, which can vote contempt proceedings and pass the matter on to the district attorney, who would then do the prosecuting. Under another provision of the law when the Senate is not in session such a matter can be referred to the President of the Senate, who, without action by the Senate, can refer it to the district attorney in the district in which the refusal to answer took place.

There is, of course, also another section, under which the district attorney himself, upon information, can refer the matter to the grand jury without coming to the Senate at all. Most of these witnesses testified in Washington. So we thought it better to refer the question to the Senate and have the Senate act upon the contempt proceeding before passing it on to the district attorney.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Has the Senator a legal opinion from the committee counsel that these witnesses should have answered and had no right under the constitutional privilege to refuse to answer?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I will say to the Senator that we have a full legal opinion on the matter. I did not bring it to the Chamber with me. Of course, the latest case on the fifth amendment is the so-called Communist case, United States against Blau, in which it was stated that a person was not called upon to testify as to one of the two links in connection with a violation of the Smith Act. The question of refusal to answer these particular questions has been studied by the legal staff of the committee, and the questions do not come within the terms of the Communist case.

Mr. FERGUSON. In other words, the committee counsel, Mr. Halley, has given the Senator an opinion that there is no right of the witness to claim his constitutional privileges with respect to the particular questions which were propounded to him, and which he has refused to answer or has evaded answering. Is that correct?

Mr. KEFAUVER. We have an opinion on the general matter of the constitutional privilege, as to the type of things which he would not be required to answer; and on the basis of this general brief we have had a full discussion as to the particular cases under consideration.

Mr. FERGUSON. Will the Senator place that legal opinion in the RECORD?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes; I shall be glad to place the opinion in the RECORD. The opinion is not directly on the questions involved here. It is on the general subject matter of the right under the fifth amendment to refuse to answer certain questions. If I may proceed and read a few additional questions—I do not want to read them all—the distinguished Senator from Michigan will see that the questions would not come under the terms of the Communist decision, or under the right of a witness to protection under the fifth amendment.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I think the question might very well be cleared up by saying that in each individual case there has been consultation in the committee, and formal action by a majority of the committee, that each individual be cited for contempt. That is the judgment of the committee. The committee has had the advice of counsel. It seems to me that that fact should largely determine the action of the Senate. This is a committee constituted by the Senate. It has devoted a great deal of time to this subject. It has discovered a great deal which I think will be of benefit to the country. After hearing the questions and seeing the conduct, and knowing what the law is, motions were made in each case that the parties be cited for contempt. I trust that it will not be necessary to go into a long discussion in each case. After all, a duly organized committee of the Senate has taken action, and its judgment should have the support of the Senate.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I thank the Senator. I may add also that the action by the committee in these cases was unanimous.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. The distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] has left the Chamber. However, I wish to say that in matters of this kind, even though action has been taken by a duly authorized committee, I believe that when the Senate is called upon to pass upon the question it should have the advice of the committee, and should feel that the action proposed to be taken can actually be carried out within the law and within the Constitution. That was the reason for asking whether or not the committee had acted after receiving legal advice from its counsel, so that we might properly take up the subject summarily, as we are now taking it up, and pass upon it.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I appreciate the statement from the Senator. I think he is exactly right.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. McKELLAR. I notice, upon examining the original resolution, that it was agreed to on May 3 last. It is now the 22d of January. In section 3 of the original resolution there is the following provision:

> All authority conferred by this resolution shall terminate on March 31, 1951.

That is a little more than 2 months from now. Does the Senator feel that proceedings such as he now asks can be determined, at this late date, before March 31?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I will say in answer to the question that the offense took place on December 12, 1950, when the witness was called upon to testify. If the Senate votes to bring a contempt proceeding, the matter will then be with the district attorney for the District of Columbia; so I do not know of any further proceedings the Senate would be called upon to take with respect to this particular matter. As to the date of May 3, I do not know what the Senator refers to.

Mr. McKELLAR. The resolution was agreed to on May 3.

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is the original resolution, Senate Resolution 202, which created the committee. This is a proceeding under that resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. But the committee seems not to have acted for some time in regard to taking testimony. I am wondering whether or not, under the circumstances, the proceedings under this resolution can be completed by the district attorney for the District of Columbia in time to proceed further under the original resolution, Senate Resolution 202. Why was there such a long delay, until December, before anything was done?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The Senator should understand that we have to take the witnesses as we get to them. The committee started——

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the senior Senator from Tennessee understands that situation without having his attention called to it.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The Senator asked me what was the reason for the delay.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. I want to know why something was not done with this resolution prior to this day. Why wait all this time and, at the last moment, so to speak, come before the Senate and seek to obtain an order of this sort?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The committee started its hearings in Miami, Fla., shortly after the resolution was adopted. Since that time the committee has been holding hearings very frequently—as often as it has been possible to get away from Washington. It so happens, with respect to this particular witness, Joe Adonis, that an effort was made to serve a subpena upon him in August 1950. He evaded service of the subpena for quite a long time, and it was only after prolonged efforts that it was possible to serve the subpena on him. As soon as it was possible to serve it on him, he was brought to Washington to testify. But I imagine that before Adonis was brought to Washington to testify the committee had probably heard three or four hundred other witnesses. The record of the committee's hearings runs to nearly 10,000 pages. Inevitably the testimony of these other witnesses came before that of this witness. Anyway, a hearing was held on December 12, and the committee had a meeting shortly after that, in which, joined in by all the members of the committee, the contempt citations were voted.

Mr. President, there are some twenty-odd pages of questions and answers set out in the report. I shall read some discussing Adonis' relationship with Charlie "Lucky" Luciano. Adonis said he had known him about 20 years.

> When did you last talk to him?
> I decline to answer on the ground that it might tend to incriminate me.
>
> Did you see Charlie "Lucky" Luciano in Habana, Cuba?
> I decline to answer.

The same response was given to questions if he ever had any business with or when he last talked with a bunch of known racketeers whose names are set forth in the record.

Mr. President, there is also the matter of Max Stark. Max Stark, it has been proved, deposited a bunch of checks taken by a gambling gang in New York. He took the checks and set up a special account with them. The gambling was done in New Jersey. The checks were cashed by him in New York. Adonis was asked about his relationship to Max Stark and he refused to answer. He refused to give the committee any information about any illegal transactions and about his legal connections with certain businesses.

It was shown that the Automotive Conveying Co. is a corporation in which Adonis is an officer and in which he has a large interest. That corporation had contracts for conveying automobiles from the Edgewater, N. J., Ford plant. It is a very large corporation. We were interested in knowing how he, an officer of that corporation and its founder, could have obtained such a contract. I might say by way of explanation that the contract was entered into back in the 1930's, and that the present management of the Ford Motor Co. has been trying to do something about it in an effort to get Adonis out of the picture. That is one of the prime things in which the committee is interested. The committee is interested in learning how people who have long criminal records, such as Adonis has, are able to get into business of that kind; what sort of influences they use.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Does the Senator seek to have the Senate take action on the question whether or not this particular individual is in contempt of the Senate, or is it merely an official reference by the Senate to the district attorney for such action as the district attorney may see fit to take.

Mr. KEFAUVER. This resolution follows exactly the same pattern——

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I am not familiar with the pattern.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The resolution provides:

> That the President of the Senate certify the report of the Special Committee * * * as to the refusal of (this man) to answer a series of questions * * * together with all facts in connection therewith, under the seal of the United States Senate, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said (person) may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

That carries with it the suggestion that the Senate wants him to be prosecuted for contempt of the Senate committee and of the Senate.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I did not get the last statement of the Senator.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I say that carries with it the obvious inference that the Senate wishes that, if the district attorney can find a legal offense in connection with the question involved, Adonis be prosecuted for his contempt.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. That is the point, Mr. President. Has the committee taken the position that this is contempt, or is it being referred to the district attorney's office?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The committee has taken the position that this is contempt, and the committee asks the Senate to refer the matter to the district attorney with the request that Adonis be proceeded against according to law.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I am thoroughly in sympathy with what the Senator is trying to do.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I appreciate that statement. I know the Senator is.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. The only thing that concerns me is whether or not either the committee of the Senate or the Senate are taking formal action or making formal determination when it does not have a legal opinion as to the probable guilt or innocence of this man. In other words, I should not like to see the committee or the Senate be placed in a difficult or embarrassing position for lack of information in this case on the part of the committee's counsel. I am not asking for the opinion of the district attorney.

Mr. KEFAUVER. This is exactly the same form of resolution that is used to refer all contempt citations to the district attorney. It provides that the record in the matter shall be certified by the Senate to the district attorney to the end that the person involved be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I understand that as to form the citation and the reference are the customary ones. I cannot say it is done in every case, but I believe frequently the committee has the benefit of the formal opinion of its counsel directed to the specific case at issue and the facts involved, advising the committee that in this particular case there is ground to believe that a contempt has been committed. I think it is merely a protection for the committee. That is the only point I am trying to make.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The committee has a brief or memorandum on the general subject involved. The particular questions and answers in this case have been studied by the counsel, Mr. Halley, and other counsel, for the committee. They have advised the committee that in their judgment they feel the individuals concerned are guilty of contempt.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, has that advice been inserted into the RECORD in connection with this resolution?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I said in answer to the question of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] a short while ago that our memorandum does not deal with each particular case, but deals with the general subject. The testimony in each particular case has been studied by counsel for the committee, and counsel have orally assured us that the individuals are guilty of violations of the statute.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. Was this resolution reported from the Senate Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. KEFAUVER. No, it is from the special committee.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON. Would the Senator say that he is now asking the Senate to find these individuals guilty of contempt, and that his reference is merely to have them prosecuted for such contempt?

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is correct.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator is asking the Senate now to pass on the question of contempt, and if the Senate should find, by adopting the resolution, that contempt exists, the Senate will rule that the individuals are guilty of contempt, and the Senate then merely asks the district attorney to prosecute for such contempt?

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is correct. That is, to have the district attorney proceed against them according to law.

Mr. FERGUSON. For the contempt respecting which the Senate is now asked to take action by means of a resolution?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes, that is correct. For the contempt of the committee.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator from Tennessee is a lawyer. Does he believe that the failure to answer these questions constitutes a contempt of the Senate, in view of the constitutional provision permitting a man to refuse to answer any question that would tend to incriminate him?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I will say to the Senator that there is no doubt about it in my mind. I think the questions which the committee asked could not possibly have anything to do with incriminating the individual of any Federal offense. They were merely questions about whether he ever had any business with a certain man or not. The questions did not extend to what the business was. They were as to whether he had had any interest in what appeared to be a legitimate enterprise.

Mr. FERGUSON. Does the Senator contend that the provision of the Constitution of the United States applying to answering questions tending to incriminate the individual means incrimination so far as a Federal statute is concerned, and not so far as a State criminal statute is concerned?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The decisions of the Supreme Court as they now stand are to the effect that in such a case as this the individual has the right to refuse to testify, under the fifth amendment, as to some matter that would incriminate him of a Federal offense. He may not refuse to testify if the answer would incriminate him of a State offense. That is the present status of the decisions of the Supreme Court. I might refer, for example, to United States v. Murdock (284 U. S. 141).

Mr. FERGUSON. So the Senator contends that if, under a State law, an answer to such a question would incriminate a witness, the witness still must answer. Is that correct?

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is correct; that is our position.

However, if even on that basis the witness had a right to refuse to answer, by saying that an answer to the question would incriminate him under any law, this witness still was refusing to testify about his connection with an apparently legitimate business, and certainly he has no right to refuse to testify about that.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. There appears to be some question about this matter. I had no objection to having it taken up, because I do not wish to appear to be in the position of trying to protect anyone who is attempting to violate the law. However, I had thought that the Judiciary Committee, whose membership is made up of lawyers, had studied this question.

Would the Senator object to letting the resolution go over, so as to provide an opportunity to study the record in regard to it?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Of course, the resolution is up for consideration at the present time. We must have these questions acted upon.

Mr. McFARLAND. Of course, the resolution could be brought before the Senate for consideration at this time only by unanimous consent. I stepped out of the Chamber for a moment, and was not here when the resolution was brought up; but it could be brought up only by unanimous consent, because the unfinished business is, as I understand, Senate Resolution 8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises the Senator from Arizona that this is a privileged matter, and would not permanently displace the unfinished business in any event. Unanimous consent was given for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. McFARLAND. Of course, it may be privileged. However, the unanimous-consent agreement provided that Senate Resolution 8 would remain the unfinished business until it was disposed of. That was a part of the unanimous-consent agreement I propounded.

I have no objection to having this other matter considered and disposed of. However, inasmuch as there are in the minds of some Senators questions as to whether the procedure now proposed is the correct one, and as to whether the Senate is asked to pass upon the matter of holding certain persons in contempt without having the evidence before it, I think that in fairness to the Senate the Senator from Tennessee should be willing to let the resolution go over until we have an opportunity to study it.

When the Senator from Tennessee spoke to me about this matter, I was under the impression that it was reported by the Judiciary Committee and that that committee had given careful study to the legal questions involved.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The Senator should know that when any committee brings forth a matter of this sort, it comes to the floor of the Senate, not to a committee.

Mr. McFARLAND. Yes, I understand that. However, evidently the Senator from Tennessee misunderstood the question I asked him. I asked whether the Judiciary Committee had reported the resolution. Evidently the Senator from Tennessee thought I was referring to his special committee when I asked that question.

Of course the Senator's special committee had a right to report as it did; but on the other hand, in fairness to Senators who have asked questions, I think an opportunity for studying this matter should be afforded.

So far as I am concerned, I am inclined to follow the recommendations of the Senator's committee, unless there is a showing that such action should not be taken. Nevertheless, I feel that if any Senators want to have an opportunity to study the matter further, such an opportunity should be provided.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I have read a great many of the questions and answers, and I really cannot see how any Senate committee could operate if it were not entitled to have answers to such questions.

For instance, this question was asked:

Did you conduct any business in New Jersey?

The answer was:

I decline to answer on the ground it might tend to incriminate me.

I read further from the testimony:

Did you ever have any business in Habana?
I decline to answer on the ground it might tend to incriminate me.

* * * * *

Did you ever hear of the L. & C. Amusement Co.?
I decline to answer on the ground it might tend to incriminate me.

Mr. President, the L. & C. Amusement Co. was a gambling outfit in northern New Jersey, as shown by other evidence.

Another question was as follows:

Did you ever hear of the Pal Trading Co.?

That was another gambling outfit.

The answer is as follows:

I decline to answer on the ground it might tend to incriminate me.

Another question and answer are as follows:

Did you ever hear of the L. & L. Trading Co.?
I decline to answer on the ground it might incriminate me.

So, Mr. President, I think the situation is very clear. This man, Joe Adonis, is one of the big-time racketeers and criminals in the country. For my part, I am unwilling to agree to defer taking action on this resolution, because the witness should be brought to justice for refusing to answer these questions, which necessarily have to be asked in connection with this investigation.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield for a question, but I do not wish to lose the floor.

Mr. McCARRAN. I have a statement to make, not really a question to ask.

However, Mr. President, I question, first of all, the right of the special committee to make a report. Reports are made by standing committees. That is the first question which comes to my mind.

Secondly, almost all the questions read by the Senator from Tennessee could very properly be answered by the witness by saying that answers to the questions might incriminate him. One of the questions which has been read to us would not appear to come in that category without stretching the point a great deal; but the others might properly be answered by the witness by saying that answers to them would tend to incriminate him.

However, it seems to me that this matter should not be rushed through the Senate in this way, but should go to a standing committee.

I respectfully suggest that the matter go to the Judiciary Committee. A similar matter was referred to the Judiciary Committee at the last session. The Senator from Tennessee is a member of that committee, and was present when that matter was considered.

This matter comes up on a somewhat different basis. So far as I am concerned, I do not care to vote one way or the other regarding this matter. I should prefer to have it go to the standing committee which is charged with the consideration of such questions.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, the Senate has voted on another contempt situation, that involving the man Russell, a Chicago racketeer, who was brought before the committee, and who now has been indicted by the United States attorney for the District of Columbia on, I think, 60 counts. If any Member of the Senate wishes to refer to the work we are trying to do, of course, that is the prerogative of every Senator. However, we have been trying very hard to follow the mandate of the Senate in carrying on this investigation.

When a committee in the course of its inquiry makes a very clear presentation, if a witness then can refuse to say whether he ever heard of anything, whether he ever was in business in New Jersey, whether he ever had any business transactions with someone else, or whether he was interested in what appears to be a legitimate business, then, of course, it is manifestly impossible for the committee to carry on the investigation. Such an investigation cannot be conducted properly unless the committee can do something with witnesses who refuse to answer such questions.

We think we are developing a picture which will be of considerable assistance to the Senate in considering the passage of certain legislation. As an indirect result, it has certainly been of assistance to local prosecutors and other officers in their efforts at least to put some blocks in the way of organized crime, which has reached tremendous proportions, and about which something must be done if we are to prevent its eating at the very heart of our democratic process.

This is an important matter, and, unless the Senate is going to back us up in citing for contempt one of the most notorious gangsters in the United States, who, in our inquiry, refused to answer almost every question that was asked him, then, of course, it will manifestly be impossible for us to proceed. I think it would certainly be very discouraging to the good law-enforcement officers of the country who have been cooperating so fully with our committee during the past few months.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an observation?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. LEHMAN. It seems to me that the request made by the Senator from Tennessee is a very reasonable one. I am not a lawyer, but I know something of the individual who is cited. I know that he has tried to avoid examination and has sought to evade the law in the State of New York for a great many years. The committee of which the distinguished Senator from Tennessee is chairman was created by the Senate of the United States, and it would appear to me that if a duly constituted committee of the Senate could report to the Senate and ask for action by the Senate only through the good offices of another committee, as, for example, a standing committee of the Senate, it would be bound to retard action; it would make the activities and work of the committee far more burdensome, and in due course would possibly lead to complete impotency on the part of the committee. It seems to me it is a very proper thing for the committee, of which the Senator from Tennessee is chairman, to report directly to the Senate, and to expect the Senate to take action upon the request.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the junior Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I move, as a substitute, that the resolution submitted by the Senator from Tennessee be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that the Committee on the Judiciary be required to report back within 1 week.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hayden	Millikin
Bennett	Hendrickson	Monroney
Benton	Hennings	Morse
Brewster	Hickenlooper	Mundt

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary is not made for the purpose of delay. It seems to me that the arrest of an individual is a matter which should be given serious thought, for it is of serious moment. It does not seem to me that any individual, however low he may have descended, should be subject to arrest by a committee of the Senate without first receiving the dignified and serious thought of the body against which the alleged contempt has been committed. If the individual involved—and I do not know him from Adam's off ox, and I care not who he is—has been guilty of contempt, he has been guilty of contempt against the Senate of the United States. Therefore the Senate of the United States should give the matter serious and at least momentary consideration. The motion pending is that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, so that the committee may report it back to the Senate within 1 week.

Let me say to the able Senator from Tennessee that, whatever his thoughts may be in the matter, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary proposes, if the motion is carried, to call the Committee on the Judiciary into special session on Wednesday, so that it may consider the subject matter and report back promptly. In all seriousness, I think the matter of the promiscuous arrest of individuals by special committees of the Senate should be looked into with the greatest of care. I submit the motion to the Senate.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, if I may be heard briefly, every committee—and the Committee on Crime Investigation has been constituted by the Senate—reports its own recommendations and findings as to whether a witness has been in contempt of that committee. Ever since I have been in Congress, as a Member of the House of Representatives and as a Member of this body, I have never heard of an instance when the Committee on the Judiciary wanted to pass on a matter involving contempt after another committee of the Senate had passed on the subject and reported its findings to the Senate.

It was not done when the Foreign Relations Committee reported the refusal of certain witnesses to testify in a recent investigation before it. I cannot recall that it was ever done in the case of any other committee. It was not done in the case of this committee when a contempt citation was brought against Harry Russell, who is just about one-tenth as vicious a racketeer as Joe Adonis. Russell was indicted for refusing to answer 60 questions. I dare say that on this record, in the case of Joe Adonis, there are more than 100 questions which he refused to answer. He thwarted the work of the committee and was very contemptuous of the committee.

The report is before the Senate. Anyone can read it and see the questions which the witness refused to answer—questions as to whether he had ever heard of a certain company or person; whether he had ever been in any business in New Jersey; whether someone had ever bought race horses for him; whether he had ever heard of the L. & L., and certain other companies and so forth. How a committee can be expected to carry on an investigation if its activities must then be reviewed by the Judiciary Committee, is beyond me. I believe that this is an effort to delay and thwart the work of the committee. The recommendation of the committee is unanimous. The testimony is before us. The work of the committee must soon terminate. I hope that the Senate will not delay the work of the committee by having the resolution referred to some other committee for review.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I wish to repeat what I said a few minutes ago, that this man Adonis is one of the most sinister and dangerous residents of New York State. He has for a long time evaded public or judicial scrutiny of his activities.

The special committee, of which the distinguished Senator from Tennessee is chairman, has reported to the Senate that Adonis has refused to answer questions which would not incriminate him under the Federal law, and therefore the committee recommends that he be cited by the Senate.

It is now proposed to refer the entire matter to the Judiciary Committee for the purpose of letting the Judiciary Committee pass on the accuracy of the report of the special committee, of which the Senator from Tennessee is chairman. While I have the greatest respect for the distinguished Judiciary Committee, it does not seem to me that there is any indication that it is any better equipped to pass upon the legal aspects of the proposed citation than are the distinguished lawyers who compose the special committee which is making the report. It seems to me that it is a most unusual procedure to refer the report of a special committee to a standing committee, rather than to submit it directly to the Senate for its determination. If that policy is to be pursued, delay in the business of the Senate is inevitable, and the purpose of our special committees, set up to avoid burdening the standing committees, will be defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOEY in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I rise as a peacemaker in this matter. I ask if the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Tennessee would not be satisfied if the Senator from Tennessee were willing to have this question go over until Thursday. Tomorrow, by unanimous consent, we are to have a vote on another matter. As I understand, there will be no session on Wednesday. If we could vote on the motion at a certain hour on a certain day, would not that be satisfactory?

It seems to the Senator from Michigan that we are now being called upon as Senators to vote as to whether or not certain conduct constitutes contempt of the Senate when, in fact, it involves contempt of a committee. Each Senator's conscience must dictate how he shall vote upon that question. It is a very important question. We have been asked today, without hearing each and every question, to make up our minds whether or not there has been contempt of the Senate, or whether or not the persons involved are guilty of contempt of the Senate, no matter who they are, or how guilty they may be of any other crime. The question is, Are they guilty of the offense of contempt of the Senate by reason of failure to answer these questions?

There are legal and constitutional questions involved. I wonder whether the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Tennessee cannot agree to a vote on Thursday. Would not that be a proper time, and would not that allow each Senator an opportunity to make up his mind on this very important question? I hope to hear from both Senators on that proposal.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, no one knows better than do members of the committee headed by the Senator from Tennessee, whether this man was contemptuous of the committee and insolent in his attitude before it. No one will know any better than do the members of this committee whether he is guilty of contempt and whether he should be cited. I see nothing to be gained by delay. I see everything to be lost. If we do not act upon the request of the Senator from Tennessee at this time, or if we delay his request, it seems to me that the United States Senate is likely to fall in the estimation of the public.

I hope we can have a vote on the motion.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I hope that the request of the Senator from Michigan will be granted, not entirely for the reason stated, however, by the Senator from Michigan. It seems to me that the questions involved here are such questions as might much better be passed upon by the Senate if a little more specific procedure were followed by the distinguished chairman of the committee. I hope that such procedure will be followed in other cases. As I understand, other similar cases are yet to be reported. A letter from counsel to the committee—and the committee has excellent counsel—stating in black and white that the record has been examined, that the committee was properly constituted, that it met at such a time and under such conditions and took such action as to justify the bringing of contempt proceedings, that the questions are pertinent questions in the judgment of counsel, and questions with respect to which the witness had no right to claim his constitutional immunity by claiming the right to refuse to answer would, it seems to the Senator from Florida, leave a completely clear and specific situation under which the Senate could promptly and properly approve the action of the committee.

If the question is to come to a vote today, the Senator from Florida will vote with the special committee, because he had the opportunity to sit, as did only four or five other Senators, throughout all the argument. The Senator from Florida happened to be presiding during a great part of the time, and he heard, in the various elements of the discussion, enough to satisfy him that the full and proper course suggested has been followed by counsel for the special committee. It seems to the Senator from Florida that it would be easy to obviate the bringing up of a question of this kind if there were a specific request from the committee coupled with a specific report and recommendation of counsel, upon which the Senate could feel assured that it was doing the right thing in voting for such a resolution.

To conclude: The Senator from Florida will vote with the committee if the Senator from Tennessee wishes the matter to be proceeded with today, because he did happen to hear the various necessary technical elements come out in the verbal statements of the Senator from Tennessee which will appear in the RECORD tomorrow. But he thoroughly agrees with the position taken by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] that a much clearer, more specific, more succinct practice is preferable, and if agreement is given to this matter to be laid over until Thursday, and to come up then with a preferred setting, and particularly if the suggested specific showing shall be incorporated in the RECORD that there can then be no question about the propriety of the action requested to be taken by the whole Senate.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, at the outset I wish to say that I resent the implication that there is any effort to delay. I have no intention of delaying. Neither do I want to burden the Committee on the Judiciary with an additional load. That committee has a heavy load to carry now. So far as I am concerned, the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan is entirely satisfactory. I do want the Senate to have an opportunity to look at a serious subject, because the arrest of an individual, regardless of how low he may have fallen, or what kind of racketeer he may be, is a serious matter. When this body sets itself up as a body to police the country, and go into States and investigate their laws with the idea of effecting somewhat of a police power, it seems to me that in this serious hour and day we are getting into rather small business.

But, Mr. President, I am entirely in accord with the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan that the matter rest before the Senate, to be considered by the whole Senate and voted on on Thursday. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. I want to thank the Senator for his attitude. I join with the Senator from Michigan in pleading with the Senator from Tennessee. I think it is no more than due under senatorial courtesy to accede to the suggestion which has been made. The report was filed only today. I realize that the Senator from Tennessee has given careful study to these matters. I have no doubt in my mind that the Senate will follow his suggestions if the Senate is given time to study the subject. But, after all, every Senator's vote has to be his own vote, not the vote of the Senator from Tennessee, and finally the votes of the respective Senators become the decision of the Senate itself.

Inasmuch as the report has been on file only 1 day it is no more than fair, and it is usually customary if Senators make the request, that a couple of days be given so they may study the matter Senators should be extended that courtesy. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will be willing to let Senators have that much time to study the subject. I believe time will be gained thereby. That is why I previously asked if the Senator was not willing to let the resolution go over. I think that in a spirit of courtesy the Senator should be willing to have it go over so as to give Senators an opportunity to study the questions which are involved.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I do not think Senators who have heard the questions read and answers given should have any question about whether the witnesses are in contempt of the committee or not. If any Senator is not satisfied on that score here the record is, and I shall be glad to read some of the questions and the answers.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. The Senator will admit, I am sure, that there are involved serious legal questions which he has probably spent some time in studying and which other Senators may want to spend just a little time in studying. I am sure the Senator does not want to deprive other Senators of that privilege. No one can make up his mind on legal questions such as these in a few moments. I hope the Senator will agree to extend to other Senators the same privilege he has had.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, it is a rather strange situation. I have seen a good many contempt citations brought before the two Houses of Congress. The situation has been explained to the Members of the Senate. Some questions have been put which the witnesses refused to answer. The question of what action should be taken has been voted on by the committee. The report sets forth many, many pages of testimony of the witness embodying questions about which he literally refused to tell the committee anything. He openly defied the committee about any business relations he had had; whether he had even heard of certain companies or not. If any Senator has any question as to the interrogatories and answers, they are here in the report and I shall be happy to read them. But I cannot interpret the proposal now made in any way except as an effort to thwart the work of the committee.

Mr. President, I want to say that I made no reflection on the distinguished Senator from Nevada. The committee has carried out, to the best of its ability, the task assigned it. At least most of those with whom we have been in touch have felt we have helped them in getting the over-all picture so that Congress might legislate. Certainly the law enforcement officers of the United States, as a general matter, have been very cooperative.

Mr. President, to say that we are dealing in small-time business is not, I think, recognizing the sinister and the ruthless character of some of the operations which are going on in interstate commerce. It so happens that later in the week it is necessary that I be away, so I shall have to ask that the matter be taken up at this time.

Mr. WATKINS and Mr. HOLLAND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Florida for a question?

Mr. HOLLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question, if the Senator from Utah does not mind.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, I do not know whether I am recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from Utah, but the Chair did not know that the Senator from Florida wished to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Florida for a question?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes, for a question.

Mr. HOLLAND. I think the Senator from Tennessee knows that I have been interested in the inquiry. I have complimented him specifically upon the work of his committee in Miami, in my State. The Senator from Florida has already said that he expects to vote with the Senator from Tennessee if he insists upon a vote being had today.

With that as a predicate, I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee if he does not recognize the fact that beyond question the matter of pertinence of the committee questions which were declined to be answered by the witness is a matter which has to do vitally with whether or not the failure to answer is contempt; and the Senator from Florida merely calls to the attention of the Senator from Tennessee that without some chance being given to look further into the matter, the only way a Senator attending here and listening eagerly to everything that has been said could come to any decision at all as to the pertinence of such questions and answers as have been incorporated in this debate would be from the statement of the Senator from Tennessee.

Does not the Senator agree that a written opinion from counsel for his committee stating affirmatively the elements which must be present before contempt can be committed, including particularly the matter of pertinence to the subject matter under investigation, and the question of whether or not refusal to answer could properly have been predicated upon constitutional grounds would set at rest this situation, and allow Senators to vote promptly, with some assurance that the votes they were casting were in accord with the sound requirements of law? Would the Senator have objection to filing such a written statement of his able counsel giving the specific affirmative ruling of counsel that the necessary elements are present in the refusal of a particular witness to testify when interrogated by his committee?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I can only say to the distinguished Senator from Florida that I have previously stated that counsel have considered the matter and have advised the entire committee that the refusal to answer certain questions and to follow the direction of the chairman in these cases constitutes a contempt, and that the matter has been fully briefed by our counsel. They have carefully considered the transcript of the record.

Of course, I would have no objection to securing a letter and filing it. However, now that the testimony is before the Senate, I cannot understand why the Senate should in this instance follow a procedure different from that followed in all the other contempt cases about which I have known, before either the Senate or the House of Representatives.

As to the pertinency of the questions which have been asked, and which the witness has declined to answer, let me say that their pertinency is obvious from the questions themselves. Let me read some of them. The witness was asked whether he had been in business with Frank Costello, and he answered by saying:

I decline to answer on the grounds it might tend to incriminate me.

Subsequently he was asked:

Have you had any business dealings with Luciano?

Referring to "Lucky" Luciano.
The answer was:

I decline to answer on the ground it might tend to incriminate me.

He was also asked:

Did you conduct any business in New Jersey?

He replied:

I decline to answer on the ground it might tend to incriminate me.

There were also the following question and answer:

Are you not still connected with the Automotive Conveying Co., of New Jersey?
I decline to answer.
The CHAIRMAN. You are directed to answer.
Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer on the ground it might tend to incriminate me.

Explanation was made in regard to the nature of the Automotive Conveying Co.

Other questions were asked about many other companies, some of which were explained as being gambling partnerships. The witness even refused to say whether he had ever heard of them. If that does not constitute contempt of a committee, then I do not know what contempt is.

Unfortunately, I am going to have to ask to be excused from attendance on the sessions of the Senate later this week. I cannot understand why this matter should be postponed. I think to postpone it would be to give encouragement to Joe Adonis..

I have similar requests to make in regard to certain other persons. I think it would be violating the recognized procedure of the Senate if we were to postpone action on these matters. The subpenas in these cases have been issued. Some suggestion has been made that in these cases a procedure different from the usual procedure should be followed. Personally I cannot agree to a procedure which would result in giving such persons that kind of encouragement.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, I am a member of the Judiciary Committee. I stand with the chairman of that committee regarding this matter. I think it should be referred to the committee for study, because there are a number of questions in regard to the legality of such procedures. Therefore, I think this matter should be thoroughly studied and investigated.

I dare say that perhaps there are only nine Members of the Senate who know what the charges are or what this matter involves. Therefore, if all Senators were compelled to vote now, most of them would be obliged to vote blindly. Consequently, a request for a postponement for 1 week seems to be a fair one.

Furthermore, Mr. President, there is an agreement that the Senate will vote tomorrow at 2 o'clock on a very important matter. I had understood that, under the agreement reached in regard to that vote, we would debate that matter today and also tomorrow, with the time tomorrow, immediately prior to the vote, to be equally divided between the proponents and the opponents.

If we are to take much time on this other matter, there will be that much less time available for us to debate the resolution on which we are to vote tomorrow at 2 p. m.

Therefore, I should like to have an opportunity to discuss the question which was pending before the resolution submitted by the Senator from Tennessee came before the Senate.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, before he proceeds will the Senator from Utah permit me to submit several more reports and resolutions relative to citations for contempt growing out of the hearings before the Special Crime Investigating Committee?

Mr. WATKINS. I yield for that purpose.

CITATION OF ANTHONY J. ACCARDO FOR CONTEMPT

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, from the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce, I submit a report (No. 26), together with a resolution citing Anthony J. Accardo for contempt of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be received, and the resolution will be placed on the calendar.

The resolution (S. Res. 44) was ordered to be placed on the calendar, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate certify the report of the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate as to the refusal of Anthony J. Accardo to answer a series of questions before the said special committee, together with all facts in connection therewith, under the seal of the United States Senate, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said Anthony J. Accardo may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

CITATION OF JAMES LYNCH FOR CONTEMPT

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, from the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce, I submit a report (No. 27), together with a resolution citing James Lynch for contempt of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be received, and the resolution will be placed on the calendar.

The resolution (S. Res. 45) was ordered to be placed on the calendar, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate certify the report of the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate as to the refusal of James Lynch to answer a series of questions before the said special committee, together with all facts in connection therewith, under the seal of the United States Senate, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said James Lynch may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

CITATION OF ARTHUR LONGANO FOR CONTEMPT

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, from the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce, I submit a report (No. 28) together with a resolution citing Arthur Longano for contempt of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be received, and the resolution will be placed on the calendar.

The resolution (S. Res. 46) was ordered to be placed on the calendar, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate certify the report of the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate as to the refusal of Arthur Longano to answer a series of questions before the said special committee, together with all facts in connection therewith, under the seal of the United States Senate, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said Arthur Longano may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

CITATION OF SALVATORE MORETTI FOR CONTEMPT

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, from the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce, I submit a report (No. 29) together with a resolution citing Salvatore Moretti for contempt of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be received, and the resolution will be placed on the calendar.

The resolution (S. Res. 47) was ordered to be placed on the calendar, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate certify the report of the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate as to the refusal of Salvatore Moretti to answer a series of questions before the said special committee, together with all facts in connection therewith, under the seal of the United States Senate, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said Salvatore Moretti may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

CITATION OF WALTER M. PECHART FOR CONTEMPT

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, from the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce, I submit a report (No. 30) together with a resolution citing Walter M. Pechart for contempt of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be received, and the resolution will be placed on the calendar.

The resolution (S. Res. 48) was ordered to be placed on the calendar, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate certify the report of the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate as to the refusal of Walter M. Pechart to answer a series of questions before the said special committee, together with all facts in connection therewith, under the seal of the United States Senate, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said Walter M. Pechart may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

CITATION OF PAT MANNO, ALIAS PATRICK J. MANNING, FOR CONTEMPT

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, from the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce, I submit a report (No. 31) together with a resolution citing Pat Manno, alias Patrick J. Manning, for contempt of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be received, and the resolution will be placed on the calendar.

The resolution (S. Res. 49) was ordered to be placed on the calendar, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate certify the report of the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate as to the refusal of Pat Manno, alias Patrick J. Manning, to answer a series of questions before the said special committee, together with all facts in connection therewith, under the seal of the United States Senate, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said Pat Manno, alias Patrick J. Manning, may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

CITATION OF JACK DRAGNA FOR CONTEMPT

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, from the Special Committee to Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce, I submit a report (No. 32) together with a resolution citing Jack Dragna for contempt of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be received, and the resolution will be placed on the calendar.

The resolution (S. Res. 50) was ordered to be placed on the calendar, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate certify the report of the Special Committee to Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate as to the refusal of Jack Dragna to answer a series of questions before the said special committee, together with all facts in connection therewith, under the seal of the United States Senate, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said Jack Dragna may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

AMERICAN BASEBALL AND THE BASEBALL COMMISSIONER

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. WATKINS. I yield for a question.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Utah may yield to me without losing the floor, in order that I may make insertions in the RECORD and may speak briefly in regard to another matter.

Mr. WATKINS. I am willing to yield for that purpose, if consent is given that I shall not thereby lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Nevada may proceed.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, one million American boys played baseball in 1950. Approximately 200,000 American boys are playing baseball on high school teams, and many boys in the Boy Scouts of America are playing baseball. As a matter of fact, the junior Senator from Nevada had the great pleasure of organizing the first junior American Legion baseball—that was in my State of Nevada. Hundreds of thousands of boys are playing baseball on the playgrounds and the grass lots throughout the United States. The parents of those boys are willing to have their sons play baseball as a wholesome means of developing stamina and character.

During these days of big-money games, baseball must be above suspicion. It would be sad indeed to permit anything to occur which would disillusion the hundreds of thousands of boys who believe implicitly in the integrity of baseball as our national sport.

A former Member of this body, "Happy" Chandler, followed the late Judge Landis as commissioner of baseball. Not a breath of scandal ever touched either one of them.

All of us remember the scandal connected with the Chicago Black Sox baseball team, and we have read about the recent scandal in connection with certain basketball games, where it was shown that bribes were paid to certain players.

However, during the long reign of Judge Landis and during the 5 years in which "Happy" Chandler has served as commissioner of baseball, not a breath of scandal or a word suggesting crookedness has occurred.

The sudden ouster of Commissioner Chandler could have serious repercussions with the wholesome young people of this country. That action has the earmarks of a personal grudge.

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an article from the sports section of the Washington Post for December 13, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FANS SHOULD BE TOLD WHY "HAPPY" FIRED

(By Jack Walsh)

Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, of Nevada, said yesterday he was "deeply concerned" over baseball's ouster of Commissioner Chandler—and not just because "Happy's" a good friend of his.

"This thing could have serious repercussions," Senator MALONE said. "I think baseball has a duty to the American people to show where Chandler has done a bad job.

"There may be details I know nothing about. Certainly no one wants a man continued in a job if he can't handle it. But the big thing to me is to find out if he's being fired for incompetence or because of a personal grudge.

"If the latter is true, then baseball is plowing up its own reputation. It means that baseball does not want a czar. It wants someone to pose as a czar while stockholders control him at their whim."

PEOPLE WATCH CLOSELY

"That's what I believe a lot of people are watching closely. And they're not all in the United States Senate."

Elsewhere in the Senate two "candidates" popped up for the job as commissioner of baseball. Actually it means that the names of Senator EDWIN C. JOHNSON (Democrat, Colorado) and Senator Scott Lucas (Democrat, Illinois) merely were mentioned.

Asked about the report, Senator JOHNSON said: "It won't amount to much. I'm for 'Happy' Chandler and wouldn't even consider it under these circumstances."

Senator JOHNSON, nonsalaried president of the Western League for the past 4 years, just returned from the minor-league meeting at St. Petersburg, Fla.

HE'S STUNNED, TOO

He said: "I'm stunned by what has happened. There was nothing in the wind down there, and I thought Chandler was riding high, wide, and handsome."

Lucas, outgoing Senate majority leader, who was defeated for reelection by Republican EVERETT DIRKSEN, was chatting with newsmen about Chandler's ouster.

"That might be a spot for you," a reporter said to him.

Lucas, presumably joking, replied: "Say, it might be at that. Why don't you fellows go out and promote me?"

Lucas is a former minor-league ballplayer. He played from 1913 to 1916 for Pekin in the old Illinois-Missouri League, and led the batters with a .350 average. He moved to Peoria and Bloomington in the Three-I League. He quit baseball at the age of 22 to practice law.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an excerpt from a broadcast by Fulton Lewis, Jr., on December 18, 1950.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPT FROM BROADCAST BY FULTON LEWIS, JR., DECEMBER 18, 1950

Baseball seems to call for a little general news attention at the moment, with the famous Happy Chandler—one time Governor and Senator of Kentucky and now high commissioner for the national sport as the apparent target of some very unsavory and undesirable elements in the sports world who are trying to get rid of him. He has a contract that expires in 1952 and when the question arose at the recent big league get-together in Florida, he was two votes shy of enough to get that renewal. One of the two votes has since swung his way, that of Mrs. Charles Comisky, who controls the Chicago White Sox, but there still is one vote shy, and the back-stage information is that the tinhorn gambling rackets, which have long tried to get in on baseball, but have been blocked at every turn by Happy Chandler, are behind the efforts to oust him. Actually, Happy Chandler has done a top-flight job for the national sport, since he went in as baseball czar in 1945, and the old-line figures in the game—the old reliables—are loud in their praise of the accomplishments he has achieved. Not the least of those accomplishments is what he has done to encourage and revivify baseball in high schools, and to restore its popularity of olden days, among the youth of the country. He has maintained a hard-and-fast policy against allowing any gambling or horse-racing interests to get into the ownership or control of any of the major league clubs, which probably is the basic reason for the attempt to get rid of him.

He is fighting the battle out, however, and he has a chance of winning. If he fails, it's bad news for the national sport, because the forces behind the attack on him are not likely to do much for the prestige of the game, in the future.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an article by Shirley Povich, published in the Washington Post sports section on December 14, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THIS MORNING WITH SHIRLEY POVICH

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA., December 13.—That was a shoddy piece of business by the major league club owners this week—the sacking of Commissioner Happy Chandler.

They didn't want a baseball commissioner, they wanted a puppet, a role that Chandler rejected at the cost of his $65,000-a-year job.

And the way they got rid of him, prodded by a willful little group who weren't even a majority, huddling in a smoke-filled room, was a throw-back to the ward heel politics that was supposed to have gone out of the game.

They didn't name a single reason why they fired Chandler. Either they had none, or reasoned that it is none of the public's business. If the latter, it was the same kind of reasoning that all but killed the game before the late Judge Landis took a hold as commissioner and restored public confidence.

Chandler could have stayed in his job if he had wanted to please all the club owners. But he had the notion that he had a duty to the people as well, the folks who paid the game's way. He cracked down on his employers for violating the rules and rubbed enough of them the wrong way to get himself unhorsed.

He had them panicked when he commented a week ago that, come total mobilization, baseball perhaps would have to fold. He was trying honestly to alert the big audience a baseball commissioner always has, to the gravity of the world situation. The owners didn't want him to say anything like that. They wanted business as usual, peace or no.

Their action in getting rid of Chandler could have sorry repercussions. The next man to take the job will have to be a lion-hearted citizen indeed, or suspect as a man who will leap to the owner's bidding when they crack the whip. They tore the stature from the commissioner's office.

If Chandler was no Landis, he was at least a respected commissioner unafraid to call the turn as he saw it. There was not the vaguest suspicion of scandal during his term. The game had its greatest era of prosperity. He gave the ballplayers the greatest breaks they ever had—their pension fund, more barnstorming time, more expense money.

His zeal for the game was unquestioned. He incurred the wrath of the owners when he insisted they keep their scouts away from high-school boys before they graduated. When they abrogated that rule of his last week, he was flooded with protests from parents and parent-teacher groups throughout the Nation, and was genuinely sad about it.

Schoolboy baseball had been one of his pet projects. He demanded that the owners contribute financially to the build-up of the game in the high schools when he took office in 1945.

Only 60,000 high-school boys were playing what the owners were always pleased to call the national game. In 1950, under Chandler's ceaseless prodding for schoolboys to get into the act, 200,000 high-school players were in the field.

The unkindest cut of all was the desertion of Chandler by the owners who at first resisted his ouster. Finally they killed him off by a unanimous 16-to-0 vote, to his shocking dismay. In the show-down they lost their nerve and became lambs in the stampeding of votes by the anti-Chandlers.

Where does baseball go from here? Sure, they'll get another commissioner. The salary is big, and there will always be applicants. But it doesn't follow that the people will be happy with the state of the game.

The public rallied behind Landis and later liked Chandler. It has been apparent for years that the baseball fans like their commissioners tough. That's the rub. The club owners don't. They want a figurehead. Maybe it's because rich men like to be yessed. They're not used to being crossed.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an excerpt from an article appearing in the Washington Daily News on December 27, 1950.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHANDLER GETS SIX MILLION

CINCINNATI, OHIO, December 27.—Baseball Commissioner Happy Chandler has sold television rights for the world series and all-star games for the next 6 years to the Gillette Safety Razor Co. and the Mutual Broadcasting System for $6,000,000.

Chandler previously had concluded a contract with the same two firms for exclusive radio broadcast games for $1,370,000 covering the period from 1950–56. This includes $125,000 paid for this year's world series game.

The Commissioner, fighting to retain his job after the big leagues refusal to renew his contract in the meetings this month at St. Petersburg, Fla., said virtually all of the money would go into the players' pension fund.

He hailed yesterday's deal as the answer to any of the fund's monetary difficulties.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, within our generation baseball, football, and basketball have become big money games. Baseball had its Chicago Black Sox scandal. Now basketball has its scandal. The people like both games, but are very sensitive about them. The people want honest games played.

Mr. President, if a few managers or owners of baseball teams, some of whom have entered the game comparatively recently, believe that the public has forgotten the dangers of corruption of personnel playing their favorite games, they may be due for a great shock.

Let me repeat that there has never been a breath of suspicion against Commissioner Chandler. Neither have any accusations of incompetence been made against him. Yet we find that arbitrarily and suddenly baseball team owners have sought to end Commissioner Chandler's regime. The real objective on their part, or what is believed by a large segment of the public to be the real objective—would seem to be to maintain in the office of Commissioner of Baseball someone who can be controlled by owners of baseball teams, rather than someone who, like Happy Chandler, will be true to the public in filling that important office in connection with the great American game of baseball.

ALLEGED LEAKAGE OF INFORMATION FROM DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Utah may yield to me for not more than 2½ minutes, so that I may make a brief insertion in the RECORD and may comment upon it.

Mr. WATKINS. I am willing to have that done, provided it is understood that I shall not thereby lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, several days ago I called the attention of the Senate, and especially the attention of the members of the Armed Services Committee, to a serious breach in our security rules, a breach which may very seriously endanger our secret codes.

The Secretary of the Army has shown an interest in this matter, and apparently he is conducting an honest and an intelligent investigation, for which I congratulate him.

However, for the benefit of the Armed Services Committee and for the benefit of the Secretary of the Army, I wish today to give some additional information about this secret document which was made public. It was Document No. 3019, dated December 15, 1950. It was a daily intelligence summary prepared by the General Headquarters, United Nations Far Eastern Command. It was stamped "Secret." The Senate will understand that I am speaking now of the decoded message which appeared in Drew Pearson's column.

The Senate will recall that at that time he said, "I got permission from the Army to publish these secret messages." The Secretary of the Army, Mr. Pace, answered and said, "No, that is not true. Pearson is again lying. We gave no such permission to Pearson." The Secretary of the Army said, "We have submitted this matter to the Judge Advocate General, to find out the extent to which our espionage laws have been violated."

For the benefit of the Armed Services Committee and the Secretary of the Army, I quote this further information: On the inside cover of this document, No. 3019, dated December 15, 1950, stamped in red lettering, "Secret," the following security ruling is found:

WARNING

This document contains information affecting the national defense of the United States within the meaning of the espionage laws (title 18, U. S. C., secs. 793 and 794). Transmission or revelation of its contents in any manner to an unauthorized person is prohibited by law.

It is intended for eyes only, and it is imperative that the material contained in it be treated with the utmost discretion. Under no circumstances shall possession thereof, or the information therein, be given to any personnel other than those whose duties specifically require knowledge thereof.

When not in use, this document—

I am still quoting, Mr. President, from the red lettering stamped on the secret document—

When not in use, this document is chargeable to the custody of an officer. See paragraphs 11, 27, 29, 33, Army Regulations 380–5.

Reproduction of the intelligence in this publication is prohibited without special authority of the A. C. of S., G–2, General Headquarters, Far Eastern Command. This document shall be destroyed within 15 days of receipt, and a copy of a certification of destruction prescribed by section 33–A, Army Regulations 380–5, shall be furnished to the A. C. of S., G–2, General Headquarters, Far Eastern Command.

That is the remainder of the warning contained on the cover of this secret document. Mr. Pearson has since then claimed that he paraphrased this decoded document; which in effect is saying that he had the document in his possession before it was paraphrased. Now, if he did—if he had that document in his possession—that secret decoded document in his possession—without any paraphrasing, with David Karr, a man who has written for the Daily Worker and for the Party Organizer, and labeled by the FBI as a Communist, then this follows the pattern in the Hiss case too dangerously close. You will recall that when Hiss was accused he claimed that he delivered State Department secrets to Chambers, thinking he was merely helping out a newspaperman. In this case someone is delivering secrets to David Karr, a named Communist, and Drew Pearson, who has long been doing the smear work for the Communist Party.

But to show that Pearson did not paraphrase this report—that this was made public in its original form, let me again quote:

The quotes from Pearson's column are accurate to the point that not one word or punctuation mark is at variance with the original text of the secret document.

Now, I call this to the attention not only of the Armed Services Committee, Mr. President, but I also call it to the attention of the Justice Department. We now have the unquestioned proof that someone is stealing secret documents and handing them over to Drew Pearson and David Karr. How many other tens or hundreds of secret documents are being stolen in like fashion we do not know, but certainly this was not the only one. In the Amerasia case, it will be recalled that thousands of classified documents were stolen and photostated and that this theft of State Department and other Government secrets came to light only when the magazine made the mistake of publishing one of them. Pearson has made the same mistake.

It is not so much the question of damage done by the publication of this one document, the danger lies in the fact that a known Communist such as David Karr and a party line smear artist such as Pearson have a pipeline to the Army's top-secret documents.

I call upon the Justice Department to act. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point an editorial from the Communist Daily Worker, which editorial very vigorously defends Drew Pearson and condemns McCARTHY for having exposed his machinations.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOW IT'S DREW PEARSON

The witchhunt has reached Drew Pearson now. This reactionary radio commentator is going to lose his contract with the Adam Hat Co., because Senator McCARTHY threatened a boycott against the company, saying Pearson "follows the Communist or fellow-traveler line." When McCARTHY points the finger, the ax starts to fall. The State Department trembles. It issues hurried memos to prove to the angry witchhunter that they deserve his confidence, since they follow his disastrous line. Big corporations hastily knife their hired actors, actresses, or commentators.

Pearson and McCARTHY are brothers-in-arms when it comes to whooping it up for war. But Pearson has made the fatal error of refusing to admire McCARTHY. He has dared to note one or two minor scandals in the war machine. He has had the gall even to mention that our casualties in Korea were running very high.

Could this "subversive" allusion to our ghastly casualty lists in Korea be tolerated by a McCARTHY or an Adam Hat Co.?

So Pearson joins the list that the Un-American Committee launched with the Hollywood 10, with John Howard Lawson and Albert Maltz and their courageous colleagues. He joins the list that includes Paul Robeson, knifed for refusing to be thrilled by MacArthur's war in Korea. He joins the victim of the General Foods crack-down, Jean Muir, and scores of other victims of the notorious "Red channels" and "counter-attack" blacklists.

The Daily News TV station will not televise Charlie Chaplin because a professional tough guy with a letterhead in New Jersey ordered them not to.

The list of victims grows all the time. It includes conservative professors teaching at the University of California for 40 years who won't sign a "pledge" never to criticize the pro-Fascist California banker Giannini's board of regents.

Certain liberals sigh with relief that Anna Rosenberg—denounced by Representative RANKIN on the floor of Congress as "that Yiddish woman" without a word of rebuke from any of the knights of freedom assembled there—has been cleared by Senator McCARTHY.

They are willing to let this imitation-Nazi determine the political and moral standards of America. If McCARTHY O. K.'s you, you are "loyal."

This is where the "anti-Communist" witchhunt and thought control are dragging America. You can't have a "little anti-Communist witchhunt" that will stop halfway and not murder the Bill of Rights. When a Communist or any progressive is fired for his antiwar views, no one else is safe from this economic purge, which has no limits until all liberty is dead.

Masking its crack-down on the antiwar views of its staffs, Columbia Broadcasting System demands "loyalty oaths" of its employees, and stages comical "armed guards" at its radio machinery to make it look good. If we wear Adam hats, is McCARTHY to dictate what goes on in our heads?

The Red scare turns America over to its worst enemies, of whom a McCARTHY is a good specimen.

There is a unity of interest among all Americans, regardless of their views, in the defense of our free speech from the rampant thought controllers. There should be unity of protest too.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point a statement entitled "These Days" by George E. Sokolsky, released on Thursday, January 11, 1951.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THESE DAYS

(By George E. Sokolsky)

SPEECH-WRITING

Drew Pearson had this in his column:

"Friends of Herbert Hoover are telling how he cleared his recent keep-out-of-Europe speech with four four-star generals in the Pentagon * * * George Sokolsky is given credit for ghosting most of the Hoover sermon."

I do not know who does me the honor to suggest that I ghosted most or any of Mr. Hoover's recent or any other speech. Certainly, it was not Herbert Hoover. He rolls his own.

If the most that can be said against Herbert Hoover's speech is that he invited my assistance, then nothing has been said against his ideas and proposals. As for the four-star generals, I know nothing about that, but it can only mean that he consulted experts and that they gave him expert counsel.

Actually, Herbert Hoover's method of writing a speech or an article is appallingly unprofessional. If columnists and other professional writers employed the same techniques, there would be fewer mistakes and the public would not so often be misled by inaccuracies, but there would be too little time left for anything else.

This is how it is done. Mr. Hoover writes a draft in longhand, which always is the best version of the speech. But he is an engineer, not an author. He discovers weaknesses, stresses, and strains under which the entire structure could crumble. He finds that he has written a sentence which sounds good but is faulty logic. He has stated something as a fact which, upon investigation, is only an assumption. He becomes cantankerous when it is suggested that the slight distortion sounds better than the rigidly stated fact. He says that he is not an orator, but needs to speak up for the citizens.

So, he works the thing all over, word by word, sentence by sentence. His recent speech was worked over 19 times, each draft being almost a complete rewriting, and all kept on file.

Not being a professional writer, he is not enamored with his own verbiage. So, he sends the document to a printer, who sets it up for him in newspaper type. Mr. Hoover finds it easier to read that way. The recent speech was sent to the printer a dozen times for revision before its author found it satisfactory.

Sometimes, Hoover sends copies of drafts to friends or experts for criticism. I have often received such drafts and have been critical, but I have never written a speech for him or any part of one. I know that Mark Sullivan has often received such drafts. I am quite sure that none were ever sent to Drew Pearson. I saw the eighteenth draft of this speech, but not any earlier ones.

Mr. Hoover has never employed a crew of speech writers. He has had no Sam Rosenman or Robert Sherwood or Clark Clifford in his entourage. Rather, he sits and fumes over it himself.

The process is trying, expensive, and can only be employed by one who takes his speeches as seriously as he hopes the public will. It is a reflex to Mr. Hoover's modesty. He does not impose his ideas on others unless and until he is sure of them himself. Lesser men are not so punctilious.

I write this about Herbert Hoover only because Mr. Pearson has involved me in this process. Frankly, I do not claim for myself the distinction of telling Mr. Hoover what to say. Neither my experience nor my intellect is equal to his nor have I grown so impudent or imprudent as to place myself on his level.

Happy in and honored by his friendship, I often consult him and find his correction of errors invaluable to myself and to my readers. I do not correct Herbert Hoover.

Unfortunately, some of us who write for newspapers have lost all sense of proportion. Because editors give us space to express ourselves and pay us for it, we fail to realize that we are reporters who have the obligation of accuracy and, if it is views that we write, honesty of purpose. A proper sense of proportion requires that we recognize that we are not the doers but the recorders, not the leaders but the interpreters. No American columnist is expected to make national policy. We leave that to Congress.

We owe it to our readers not to write what we have not investigated. Drew Pearson questioned neither Mr. Hoover nor myself on this matter of speech writing.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point an editorial entitled "Drew Pearson—Keyhole Reporter"—published in the Maynard (Minn.) News, December 22, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DREW PEARSON—KEYHOLE REPORTER

The little episode between Senator McCARTHY and Drew Pearson has focused attention on the keyhole columnist who has done more damage to democracy than any single journalist, including the editor of the Communist Daily Worker.

For a long time, this editor has had nothing but contempt for Drew Pearson and his tactics.

On May 20, 1949 (a year ago last May), we had an editorial in the Maynard News on Pearson in which we outlined his shortcomings.

On several occasions we wrote letters to President John Cowles of the Minneapolis Star-Tribune, urging him to discontinue publishing the Drew Pearson column on his editorial pages.

On May 19 of this year, we had lunch with Mr. Cowles and left with him a seven-page report on Drew Pearson which should have convinced even the most skeptical that he was not a responsible journalist, but on the contrary, was irresponsible, vicious, and devious in his reporting.

Mr. Pearson's column still appears in the Minneapolis Star, but they did explain that they watch it closely and blue pencil many of the more objectionable paragraphs.

For the benefit of our readers, we would like to publish the report we handed to Mr. Cowles last May:

Drew Pearson has rattled more skeletons in private closets than any other columnist in the business. He has a key hole personality, and he makes his scandal mongering pay off in political currency. His timing of exposés leaves the conviction in the minds of observers that he smears for a purpose. Almost invariably that purpose coincides with the wishes of the left wing, powers that be in the Nation's Capital.

When Russia was our ally, back in the days of 1943, he went overboard in his praise of all things Russian. He sided with the Communists more often than against them, and was unduly critical of the anti-Communists. Even though most Americans were aware of the totalitarian makeup of the ruthless Soviet government, he ignored the menace.

When it became less popular to be pro-Russian and pro-Communist he made occasional and hypocritical attempts to convince his readers that he was anti-Communist. He has always been most vociferous in his fight against the Franco brand of fascism, but he praises Communist dictator Tito.

When efforts to rout Communists out of Government threaten the continuity of the radicals in the administration, Drew Pearson uncorks his smear pot, sets his leg men in motion, and comes up with an effective, devastating smear of the anti-Communists. When he isn't doing a job of character assassination, he is number one apologist for the pinkos in Government. He is particularly responsive to the dictates of the Frankfurter protégé and he took a prominent part in the efforts of the CIO-PAC and left-wing administration forces to reelect Senator Claude Pepper, of Florida. He used his phony predictions as propaganda to help Mr. Pepper, who was later repudiated at the polls by the people of Florida.

Drew Pearson, like a few other smear artists, has done more to discredit Congress than any other propagandist. His attacks on anti-Communist Senators and Representatives are well known.

He smeared Congressman Martin Dies, and it is common knowledge that Dies was frightened out of public life.

He exposed Congressman Parnell Thomas at a time when Thomas was exposing communism in Hollywood—even though it is said that Pearson had the goods on Thomas long before the exposé.

He smeared Senator HOMER FERGUSON when the Senator was fighting communism in the Senate, and failed to retract when the Senator and his wife proved his accusations false.

He smeared Senator JOE MCCARTHY during the current Red hunt by implying that McCARTHY criminally evaded taxes. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 96, part 5, page 5869.) When Senator McCARTHY told the true facts on the floor of the Senate, Pearson did not make amends.

Early in April 1950 Pearson smeared Fulton Lewis, Jr., by accusing him of dishonesty, and subsequently failed to retract when Lewis proved him to be a liar.

Newspapermen, columnists, and Members of Congress blamed Drew Pearson for driving Secretary Forrestal to suicide by his hounding tactics and false accusations.

As a journalist, Pearson is not a credit to the profession. He has "leg men" in many strategic spots. One of them haunts the hallways and cafeteria of Capitol Hill, pumping information from disgruntled employees about the bosses, and using these rumors to develop files for future use—if he finds it politically expedient to smear the Congressman so as to make him ineffective.

The files in the Committee on Un-American Activities contain a great deal of information which shows how his sympathy for Reds has extended back to 1943. Following are a few excerpts:

On March 12, 1948, President Harry Truman denounced Drew Pearson as a liar and as the author of vicious statements. Truman said of Pearson:

"Pearson is one columnist in Washington who wouldn't have room on his breast if he got a ribbon for every time he's been called a liar."

He was regarded by the late President Roosevelt as a chronic liar. Ex-Secretary of State Cordell Hull referred to him as follows: "The truth is not in him; he is a pathological liar."

It is interesting to note that the chief "leg man" for Drew Pearson and his personal emissary to Europe in 1947 was one now known under the name of David Karr, formerly a writer for the (Communist) Daily Worker and for such party-line publications as Fight (magazine), the Hour and Equality.

Mr. Pearson has an illuminating record of his own. On June 26, 1947, the (Communist) Daily Worker announced that Drew Pearson testified as a character witness in the case of 16 leaders of the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee, which was instrumental in bringing to this country, Gerhard Eisler, agent of the Communist International and notorious terrorist. The 16 leaders of this organization, which has been cited as a Communist front by the Special Committee on Un-American Activities on March 29, 1944, were convicted for contempt of Congress in a Federal court on June 27, 1947. Drew Pearson used the proceedings to launch an attack on the Committee on Un-American Activities.

According to the Washington Post of June 23, 1947, Drew Pearson attacked the House Civil Service Committee's loyalty program for ridding the Federal Government of subversive elements.

In his column of November 27, 1943, Drew Pearson assailed Lt. Comdr. Harold A. Burch of naval intelligence for taking Communists off the crews of merchant ships going to Murmansk, Russia.

On October 23, 1943, he praised Andrei Vishinsky, the author of numerous recent diatribes against the United States, as "the famous prosecutor" and "a man of national stature," equivalent to "the most outstanding member of the United States Supreme Court."

On October 21, 1943, Pearson published a long and enthusiastic euology of Tito, the Communist dictator of Yugoslavia, who was then high in the good graces of Joseph Stalin.

On October 18, 1943, he attacked Secretary of State Hull on the ground that he "does not understand Russian temperament" and that he "has already aroused Russian suspicions." On August 28, 1943, he again criticized Mr. Hull for his anti-Russian attitude. On August 27, 1943, he condemned the removal of Sumner Welles on thhe ground that Russia would be left without a champion in the State Department. He decried the influence of those in the Department who "have established long records as hat ers of the Soviet Russia."

On October 12, 1943, Mr. Pearson praised Assistant Secretary of War, John McCloy, for granting a commission and a citation to Robert Thompson, presently a member of the national committee of the Communist Party.

On September 18, 1943, Pearson took to task Adolf Berle, Jr., Assistant Secretary of State, for stopping shipments of oil to Russia on the ground that they were needed at home, for granting of passports to anti-Communists and for his associations with anti-Communists.

On September 9, 1943 he deplored the fact that the State Department refused to issue passports for CIO leaders to visit Russia.

On September 13, 1943, Pearson who recently garnered much publicity with his so-called Freedom Train to Italy, press agented by David Karr (Katz), predicted that "the political pendulum normally swings from fascism to communism and will probably do so in both Germany and Italy."

On July 7, 1943, Drew Pearson featured the visit to the White House of Joseph Curran, who at that time was in cahoots with the Communists, and a delegation from the National Maritime Union, then completely under Communist control.

On July 23, 1943, he praised the diplomacy of Joseph Davies and his ability to get along with Joseph Stalin, simultaneously calling attention to the "sour note" struck by the "blunt" Admiral Standley in Moscow.

On June 11, 1943, he referred to Hon. Martin Dies, former chairman of the Special Committee on Un-American Activities, as one who is looking for new bogeymen to keep his committee going since Stalin dissolved the Comintern.

On June 1, 1943, Pearson published a strong defense of Malcolm C. Dobbs, who was expelled from the Birmingham CIO Council in December 1947 as a Red, criticizing the War Department for alleged discrimination against Dobbs.

On May 1, 1943, he again criticized the War Department for its alleged ill treatment of Milton Wolff, a well-known member of the Communist Party.

On April 29, 1943, Drew Pearson defended William E. Dodd, Jr. who was removed from the Federal payroll because of his subversive record. He also defended in this article, Frederick L. Schuman, a notorious Soviet apologist.

On April 14, 1943, he sang another song of praise for Herman Bottcher, a member of the Communist Party, John Gates, now editor of the Communist Daily Worker and a group of others of the same stripe, formerly members of the so-called Abraham Lincoln Brigade.

On December 9, 1942, he praised the film, Mission to Moscow, explaining that it would analyze the Moscow treason trials, regarding which Stalin was right after all.

At one time Mr. Pearson proposed that Gen. Douglas A. MacArthur, who is, of course, anathema to the Kremlin, receive a medal which would have a ribbon with a streak of yellow and a piece of baloney on the end.

On September 12, 1943, Drew Pearson answered President Roosevelt's charge that he is a chronic liar. The statement is important because it explains the reason for animus toward men like MacArthur, Standley, Berle, and Hull, and it may cast some light on the attitude of an administration which has from its inception been wedded to a policy of appeasement toward the Communists. Perhaps it explains why some of these men have been relegated to the background in the past and why men like Robert C. Alexander and Admiral William D. Leahy are being hounded today. The statement follows:

"In this difficult mosaic of peace the boys (in the Armed Forces) also know that the most delicate problem is Russia * * * I have long contended—in columns which the President brands as chronically lying—that there is no use constantly pin-pricking Russia.

"Russia is already irked and angry over the fact that we have started no second front in Western Europe * * * However, civilians are entitled to express the commonsense opinion that being unable to give Russia the main thing she wants, we should lean over backward to give her everything else within reason.

"Especially we should give her surcease from needling. * * * The men upon whom Mr. Hull relies most for advice on Russia are Assistant Secretary of State Adolf Berle and Leo Pasvolsky. Berle has a long record of anti-Russian activity * * * Pasvolsky was secretary to the last anti-Soviet Ambassador in Washington."

MINORITY VIEWS ON WIRE-TAPPING INVESTIGATION — REFUTATION OF STATEMENT BY DREW PEARSON

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, seldom in my public life have I ever responded to either baseless or ill-tempered attacks upon me, nor do I intend to dignify one now. However, lest complete silence be misinterpreted, and as an assurance to my colleagues that the very faulty conclusions which appeared in a column of the Washington Post of yesterday, insofar as they pertain to the junior Senator from New Jersey, are completely without foundation in fact, I ask unanimous consent that there be incorporated in the body of the RECORD at this point in my remarks, a statement already released by me to the press which clearly indicates my position.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I did not know he was going to touch on this today, but the Senator is touching upon an article which appeared yesterday in the Washington Post, Washington's Daily Worker, which gives the Senator from Wisconsin credit for having prepared a report, which was in fact prepared by the Senator from New Jersey. Let me ask the Senator whether I am correct in saying that the only contact I had with this report was to sign it, having confidence in the Senator from New Jersey who prepared it—and I think he did an excellent job—that I had nothing to do with the preparation of it; that the first time I saw it was when it was brought to my office for signing, and that then, as the senior member of the committee, Senator WILLIAMS being absent, I merely ordered it transmitted to the committee as a whole.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. That is correct. I ask that the statement already released by me to the press be included in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT TO THE PRESS BY SENATOR HENDRICKSON

I was highly amused at Mr. Drew Pearson's deductions in respect to my sponsorship of the minority views on the recent wire-tapping investigation, particularly that figment of his imagination which led him to severely indict every single member of the Republican minority committee on committees. One has but to read the names of that distinguished group of Senators to know that they would not be parties to such a cheap and tawdry trade as that with which Mr. Pearson charges me—and without their complete accord I could never have enjoyed a place on the Judiciary Committee nor would I have wanted it. Had Mr. Pearson attended those last meetings of the Pepper subcommittee he would have heard me say there substantially the things which I incorporated in the minority views. I still feel very strongly that a congressional committee is not a grand jury in any sense, and that any action taken on the Pepper report should proceed with the utmost care and caution in the interest of simple decency and justice.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the body of the RECORD at this point a letter from the distinguished senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER], chairman of the committee on committees of the Republican conference, which I hope will serve to put to ridicule the deductions arrived at in the column to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
January 22, 1951.

HON. ROBERT C. HENDRICKSON,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR HENDRICKSON: Referring to the article that appeared in yesterday's paper, I just want to assure you that Senator TAFT or no other Member of the Senate influenced your appointment to the Judiciary Committee by speaking to me or any other member of the Committee on Committees in advance of our final session. There are 15 members on the Committee on Committees. All but two were present when the final report was prepared for the Republican conference. Our report to the conference was unanimous.

As you are not a member of the Committee on Committees, it might be interesting for you to know something about how the committee works. Every Senator is contacted in advance of any meetings with the request that he list any committee changes or committee assignments that he desires. Then we have two work sheets, one of them listing the Members in the order of their seniority with a notation as to their letter if their committees are satisfactory of if they want to change, also showing the committees on which they are serving at the present time. The other list gives us the information on each committee, indicating the vacancies as well as the names of those who are on the committees. In an adjoining column we list the requests for any vacancy on each committee. With this information at hand, the task of making the committee assignments is purely mechanical except in cases where two or more Members with the same seniority ask for the same committee assignment. In that case the appointment is finally determined by drawing lots, but no situation of that kind arose at our last meeting.

Working down the list in order of seniority, the first Member we came to for a committee assignment was Senator TOBEY, who requested Foreign Relations in place of Banking and Currency. We had several other requests, but since Senator TOBEY had seniority, he was given the assignment. We moved on down the list in this manner and when we came to your name we found that your first request was for Armed Services. Your second request was Judiciary, and that is what you got in place of District of Columbia. There were two vacancies to fill on the Judiciary Committee. Senator WATKINS was at the top of the list, and your name came second. That is the reason you were given the assignment, not because of any deals or trades that were made as was inferred by the article appearing in yesterday's paper.

I am glad to give you this report for your own record.

Sincerely yours,

HUGH BUTLER,
United States Senator, Chairman, Committee on Committees, Republican Conference.

ASSIGNMENT OF AMERICAN TROOPS TO DUTY IN EUROPE

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, the Wherry resolution now before the Senate declares it to be the sense of the Senate that no ground forces of the United States should be assigned to duty in the European area for the purpose of the North Atlantic Treaty, pending the adoption of a policy with respect thereto by the Congress.

The resolution seeks to do two things: First, to advise the President that no forces should be sent to Europe by the President to implement the Atlantic Pact until Congress has adopted a policy with respect thereto; and second, it implies that Congress does have the right to declare a policy with respect to the sending of troops to aid in the implementation of the Atlantic Pact.

The President apparently has taken the position that he has full power to send additional troops to Europe in effect to garrison that area against the threat of an attack by Communist Russia or other enemies without the approval of Congress.

So far as I have been able to determine, he has not indicated whether he is depending on his general powers as the so-called Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, or on the powers granted in the Atlantic Pact.

In my discussion today I am not going into the question of what is wise or unwise strategy in preparing our defenses against Communist Russia and her satellites and their program of expansion. That discussion I intend to make later, following the Senate action on the Wherry resolution.

The President's power to send additional occupation forces to Germany and Austria for the purposes of the occupation is likewise excluded from this discussion.

Since the Wherry resolution has been pending, I have spent some time reading the debate on the Atlantic Pact, including the hearings before the Foreign Relations Committee. It seems clear to me that the question now raised, that of sending armed forces to garrison Europe prior to an armed aggression, was not in any sense considered a part of the pact.

The question was raised directly at the hearings of the Foreign Relations Committee by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER]. The Secretary of State, Mr. Acheson, categorically denied that the pact had for its purpose or its intent the sending of American troops to garrison Europe to meet any possible defense prior to an armed aggression. That was the generally accepted interpretation of the pact during the entire debate.

Article 3 of the North Atlantic Pact reads as follows:

> In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this treaty, the parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.

When article 3 was under discussion, there was no intimation by any of the proponents of the treaty that it included authority for the sending of armed forces to Europe prior to armed aggression. In fact, the entire discussion revolved around the question of whether or not it bound us to furnish arms and armaments.

A reservation to article 3 was presented and was thoroughly discussed. So far as I can recall, there was no intimation whatever that the article had for its intention and included any authority for the sending of Armed Forces prior to aggression. It was limited strictly to the question of furnishing armaments to our allies, or they, on their part, to us.

It seems to me that the proponents of the treaty and the administration of this country and other countries involved are limited by that interpretation and that legislative construction as shown by its history.

I have checked the pact again to ascertain if there is any possibility that the authority to send troops to Europe to implement the pact prior to an armed aggression is contained in article 5. Again the answer is "No."

The debate on article 5 indicates clearly that it was not intended as an authorization for the sending of troops to Europe. Article 5 is a pledge of mutual assistance in the event of armed attack in Europe or North America on one or more of the signatory powers.

The reservation I offered with respect to this article attempted to make it clear that the United States assumed no obligation to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area or to assist any other party or parties in said area by Armed Forces, or to employ the military, air, or naval forces of the United States under article 5 or any article of the treaty for any purpose unless the Congress shall by act or joint resolution so provide and authorize. This reservation, it will be noted, not only contained a reservation to article 5 but to any other article of the treaty which might in any way tend to give or actually give any power to declare war or to authorize the employment of the military, air, or naval forces of the United States without congressional authorization.

During the debate it was said by the proponents of the treaty that this reservation was absolutely unnecessary. It was contended that our constitutional processes which included the right of the Congress to declare war and authorize the employment of our Armed Forces in the preparation for, or in the prosecution of a war, were unimpaired and in nowise affected by the treaty.

I took the opposite position. I felt that the treaty was a commitment which placed us in a position where a declaration of war was no longer a matter of debate, but merely a question of the fulfillment of a treaty obligation.

I felt by interpretation of the treaty the time might come when action would be taken under the treaty and in reliance on its terms without allowing the Congress to exercise its constitutional right in determining whether the Nation should be taken into war or not.

My suggested reservations were rejected, and, by that rejection, my construction of the meaning of article 5 and other articles of the treaty was also rejected. The debate, however, made it clear that the theory on which the treaty was presented to the Senate implied that our Armed Forces were not to be involved in Europe by reason of obligations contained in the treaty until armed aggression had happened against one of the signatory powers and until Congress had been consulted. That was the sense of the Congress when the treaty was ratified.

The argument that additional war-making powers were given to the President by the Congress when it ratified the North Atlantic Pact has no validity. If the President has any power whatsoever to send American troops to Europe in anticipation of an attack against our Atlantic Pact allies and without congressional authorization, that power must be derived from a construction of the Constitution of the United States and not from the provisions of the Atlantic Pact or any other treaty.

I concede that promises of such assistance have been made. They were made at Brussels by Dean Acheson, speaking for the United States. At Brussels, Dean Acheson sat down and worked out the structure of a European Defense Army. The conferees as Brussels decided how this army should be composed, where the troops should come from, and how its commander should be selected and appointed.

Earlier, at the time of the conferences in Washington, the President himself assured the representatives of the North Atlantic nations gathered there that American troops would be committed to the proposed European army. In reply to queries as to whether he had this authority and could make such commitments without first consulting the Congress, the President, in statements which were given wide press publicity, took the position that he possessed this power in himself and that the fears that Congress might not agree to the dispatch of American troops to Europe therefore need not greatly concern the conference.

At some future time I intend to analyze the legislative history of the Atlantic Pact in greater detail. Its meaning and its purposes no doubt will be discussed if the majority of this body, acting under instructions from the President, attempts to secure passage of a resolution to authorize the President to send American ground forces to Europe to meet a threat of war prior to an actual armed attack.

Editorial writers and columnists and some Members of Congress are taking the position that the question as to the power of the President to send our Armed Forces anywhere in the world with the intention of being there to engage in war, is largely academic. They also take that position with respect to the intervention in Korea. They take the position that since such action has already been taken by the President, the question is of no further importance, and that discussion of the question at this time, therefore, can do little good.

I totally disagree with this view. The question is one of usurpation of power by the President. The fact that he has usurped the powers of Congress and committed the Nation to war in Korea does not make his action right. Unless it is challenged, however, it will be regarded as a precedent and will form the basis for further similar usurpations in the future.

The entire question is of vital importance to the people of the country. It should be openly and freely debated and the people should be made aware of the terrible implications of the grasp for absolute power in respect to the Armed Forces of the United States which is represented by the President's action in regard to intervention in Korea and his proposal to send troops to Europe without consulting Congress.

The contention that the President has absolute and unlimited powers in respect to the use and control of the Armed Forces of the United States to enlarge upon the North Atlantic Pact is an example of the development of the executive agreement as a substitute for treaties and as a means of getting around the right of Congress to participate in the making of treaties.

The bypassing of the United States Senate in the making of treaties by use of the so-called executive agreement has positively endangered the very existence of this Nation. I cite for the Senate's attention the executive agreements made by the President of the United States at Yalta, Tehran, and Potsdam.

If the Yalta, Tehran, and Potsdam agreements had been submitted to the Senate for approval, as they should have been under the Constitution, their flaws, their weaknesses, and their outright surrender to the Soviet Union would have been recognized and brought to attention. The sell-out of the great principles of the Atlantic Charter objectives would have been discovered in time and our Nation would not have committed itself to the fulfillment of the imperialistic objectives of Russia. It is my belief that if the Senate had been consulted in respect to the Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam agreements, there would have been no sell-out of Asia and that the history of the past 5 years would have been vastly different.

The war in Korea is the most tragic chapter in American history. It is a chapter which is being written by executive action of the President without consultation with the Congress. It is my belief that the Korean disaster would not have fallen upon the world if the Congress had been consulted before the intervention in Korea was ordered.

I do not say that the Congress might not have ordered our troops into Korea. I do say, however, that sober minds and native hardheadedness might have prevailed over the impetuous and spur-of-the-moment way of doing things.

The Congress would have wanted knowledge of the facts and would have required an estimate of the probable consequences.

The United States withdrew its troops from Korea on June 30, 1949. This was done in pursuance of a United Nations General Assembly request of December 12, 1948. The withdrawal was ordered by the President without consulting the Congress.

On June 9, 1949—not 1950—Maj. Gen. Charles B. Helmick, a former deputy military governor of Korea, testified before the House Foreign Affairs Committee that if Russia decided she wanted to take over in South Korea, she could do so without any military difficulty. General Helmick said:

> They are right there with large armies. Any troops there would suffer another Bataan.

General Helmick's testimony represented the generally accepted military viewpoint.

This is a matter of record. On June 21, Brig. Gen. P. M. Hamilton, Chief of the Policy Division, Directorate of Plans and Operations, United States Air Forces, testified before the House Foreign Affairs Committee and stated that it would not be wise to keep troops in Korea. Rear Adm. E. T. Woolridge, Assistant Chief of Naval Operations, told the committee that he concurred in that testimony. General Hamilton then went on to inform the committee that the view expressed by him was the position of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and that that position was unanimous.

It was on the basis of testimony of that type that the minority members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee concluded that the extension of vast amounts of economic aid to Korea was pouring money down a rat hole unless Korea could be defended. It was their feeling that by extending economic aid with no assurance that Korea could be defended, we were merely fattening the prize for the Communists. In a minority report, the five Republican members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee stated as follows:

> Every authority who has testified before the Committee on Foreign Affairs with respect to the Korean situation has acknowledged the fact that there would be no effective defense against an armed aggression originating in the northern half of the country * * * our forces, with the exception of an advisory mission, have been withdrawn from South Korea at the very instant when logic and common sense both demanded no retreat from the realities of the situation.

The withdrawal from Korea was a matter of Executive decision. The Congress was not consulted, and had no part in that decision.

Some 6 months later the Secretary of State informed the world that Korea was outside the defense perimeter of the United States. That decision was taken by the executive department. The Congress was not consulted.

As recent history has shown, this decision announced by Dean Acheson was the engraved invitation which the Communists accepted and translated into action within 6 months. The record will show that many Members of the Congress of the United States and many of our citizens who are acquainted with foreign affairs, raised questions regarding every one of the three actions which I have mentioned. As far back as November 1947, Thomas E. Dewey declared that the Russians "anticipated that immediately upon the withdrawal of American and Soviet occupation troops, the armed forces of the north will engulf all of Korea." Mr. Dewey was not alone. Many other Americans felt as he did.

It is my feeling that the question of the withdrawal of our occupation forces from Korea should have been submitted to the Congress. The decision that Korea was outside the defense perimeter of the United States should likewise have been submitted to the Congress. The question as to whether or not our forces should have been sent to intervene in the Korean civil war should likewise have been submitted to the Congress.

I interpolate to say that I so declared at the time, on June 27, when the President had taken action without referring the subject to Congress.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WATKINS. I yield.

Mr. KEM. Earlier in the afternoon the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] made reference to the time when the press release from the White House was read to the Senate. I refer to the press release in which the Senate was advised that the President had ordered the Armed Forces of the United States into Korea. The Senator from Texas made the observation that most people threw up their hats and applauded the action of the President. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if he applauded the action of the President on that occasion.

Mr. WATKINS. I think the RECORD will show that on that occasion I interrogated the majority leader during his reading of the press release—not a message to Congress, but a press release—as to the authority of the President under which he was taking the action at that time. The majority leader responded by saying that the statement would have to speak for itself. Then I went on to make some further observations, for which I was criticized by some people in Utah. Some columnists took me to task for my observations. Apparently some columnists are the kind of strange animal that believes the Constitution should not be mentioned in the Senate or in other decent company, and therefore they immediately said I was an isolationist.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. WATKINS. I yield.

Mr. KEM. I ask the Senator from Utah whether he in any way approved of or applauded the action of the President of the United States on that occasion.

Mr. WATKINS. I did not. On the contrary, I felt that certain questions should have been asked of the President, and that the matter should have been considered by Congress.

Mr. KEM. I ask the Senator from Utah if his views in regard to the Korean episode today are the same as those he entertained on June 27, 1950.

Mr. WATKINS. With respect to the necessity of submitting the question to Congress, yes. I may say that I have received literally hundreds of letters from my constituents in Utah who have approved my stand. Incidentally, some of those who are now demanding that Congress take an interest in the decision as to where our troops are to be sent are the same ones who were condemning me at the time I asked the question of the majority leader, and indicated that Congress should have been given some consideration in the matter before the President sent our Armed Forces to intervene in a war between North Korea and South Korea.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. KEM. I ask the Senator from Utah whether the position he took on hearing of the President's action in ordering our troops into Korea was made the subject of a cartoon published in the Washington Evening Star a day or so afterwards.

Mr. WATKINS. As I recall, it was. As I remember the cartoon, it portrayed the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM], the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], and the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. WATKINS], as marching at the head of an army, with the senior Senator from Ohio turning around to see where the followers were. Apparently there were only three of us, and no one else was following us in taking the stand that the matter should have been submitted to Congress before troops were ordered into Korea.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WATKINS. I yield.

Mr. KEM. I should like to ask the Senator if the number of followers has not been augmented since that time.

Mr. WATKINS. I would say that Senators will probably find that letters from their constituents are very numerous on this subject, and that the letters will be found to be close to 100 to 1 in favor of insisting that from now on the question of sending American troops into positions where they will be engaging in war should be submitted to Congress. There will be found to be almost unanimous approval of the action for which we were condemned at that time.

The Senator from Missouri raises substantially the same question which I raised. The next day the Senator from Ohio made a speech on the subject, pointing out that in his judgment the President had violated the Constitution, and that the entire matter should first have been submitted to Congress for approval.

Mr. KEM. I thank the Senator from Utah.

Mr. WATKINS. I thank the Senator for asking the questions, and I have a rather keen memory of what occurred. In my own State some of the leading citizens bought space in the daily newspapers, quoted from columnists who did not know what they were talking about, and who had never read the RECORD, and stated, in effect, that I had held the State of Utah up to shame and disgrace by taking such a stand. I felt it rather keenly, because all I had done was to raise the constitutional question as to the authority under which the President was acting, pointing out that in my judgment, in response to a request from the majority leader, former Senator Lucas, of Illinois, the President should have sent a message to the Congress giving the Congress the facts and asking Congress for authority to do whatever was necessary to protect the interest of the United States.

Mr. KEM. I gather from what the Senator says that, judging from the present state of his mail from Utah, he is not now a prophet without honor in his own country.

Mr. WATKINS. I have not been home since this subject became so torrid, but I believe that I would be received with a little more grace by a good many persons, some of whom probably thought that I had disgraced the State by mentioning the Constitution of the United States on the floor of the Senate, and calling the attention of the country to the duty which I thought was incumbent upon the President, and to what he had done, which, in effect, it seemed to me was in violation of his responsibility, by ordering American troops, without congressional approval, into not merely a police action, but a full-fledged war in which we have suffered more casualties to date than in all the other wars of the United States put together, with the exception of the Civil War and the two World Wars.

I now resume my prepared text.

Had the decision of the Congress with respect to Korea been the same as that made by the President alone, at least it could be said that the action taken was taken by the President in cooperation with the Congress of the United States. Thus would have been avoided the present confusion and the people of the United States would at least have known that the action represented the will of their Government, not merely the impulsiveness of the President.

Mr. President, having pointed out that the question of the powers of the President and the powers of Congress with relation to war and foreign policy are matters of vital concern to our present and future existence as a nation, I believe further discussion of the constitutional questions is fully justified.

The great men who presided at the birth of our Republic had had their fill of absolutism in government. They were determined that the new government which they helped to bring into being should not fall into the hands of any individual or group of individuals.

In pursuit of that they set up a government of three branches and contrived and wrote into the Constitution a system of checks and balances designed to prevent any one of these branches from assuming too much power.

In recent years, behind the screen of one national emergency after another, more and more power has been concentrated in the hands of the Executive at the expense of the legislative branch. This has gone so far that the present Executive now does not hesitate to claim that he has indisputable and sole authority over the Armed Forces of the United States and that his powers are so absolute in that respect that he can order our Armed Forces into an all-out war in Asia or to the European continent in anticipation of large-scale war without consulting Congress or anyone else.

My opposition to such a usurpation of power dates back many years. The most recent manifestation of it was my statement to the Senate on June 27, 1950, the day the President ordered our Armed Forces to intervene in Korea.

That is the statement which has just been the subject of colloquy with my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. KEM].

I do not know on whose advice the President suddenly decided last June to reverse his previous policy and to plunge us into war in Korea. I do know that he did not consult the Congress; he merely told the Congress, at the same time he told the rest of the world, what he had done, after he had ordered United States troops into the Korean war. He told Congress by reason of the same press release, which did not even have the dignity of an address to the Congress.

In a colloquy on this floor on January 17, 1951, between the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], and myself, certain constitutional points were reemphasized. The Senator from Colorado pointed out that the Congress has the power to declare war and that that power carries its own implications of very wide scope, inclusive and exclusive. He pointed out, too, that under the Constitution the Congress has the power to raise and support armies. It was brought out that while the President has a vast field of implied power arising out of his status of Commander in Chief, the Congress, too, has large powers in respect to the Armed Forces, both by expressed terms of the Constitution and by implication flowing from the express grants of power.

It was brought out in the colloquy of January 17 that if the role of the Congress in determining whether our Armed Forces should be used in war were derived solely from Congress' power of the purse, such role would amount to very little. It is obvious that if the President by unilateral action had taken us into war or into a situation where war could not be avoided, the Congress thereafter could not refuse the funds necessary to extricate us from a situation of national peril.

Last June, when our forces were ordered into action in Korea, the Congress was in session here in Washington. As will be recalled, the President called members of the Foreign Affairs and Armed Services Committees of Congress to the White House and read to them the announcement that our sea and air forces had been ordered into action in Korea. He did not consult them. He told them what he had already done. That is the nearest he ever came to telling Congress, in a dignified and official way, what action he had taken. Thereafter the announcement was read on the floor of the Senate, as I have already related.

The President asked for no advice, nor did he ask for the consent of the Congress. No resolution was introduced requesting congressional approval and endorsement of his action. The Congress was merely told by the majority leader that the Armed Forces of the United States had been ordered into action in Korea by the President. There it stopped—no more, no less.

As will be recalled, I took the floor that day to suggest that the President's action in committing the Armed Forces of the United States into Korea without consulting the Congress was illegal and unconstitutional.

Events are such that today the whole Nation is asking the questions I asked on this floor last June. In the face of rising public opinion it now appears that the President himself is wavering in his determination that he need not consult the Congress in respect to the waging of war on foreign soil. Even he seems reluctantly to be coming to the conclusion that he went too far in his action last June. Aroused public opinion seems to be having its effect.

(At this point Mr. WATKINS yielded to Mr. FERGUSON, and debate ensued regarding the postponement of action on the resolution submitted to Mr. KEFAUVER, citing certain persons for contempt, which, on request of Mr. WATKINS, was ordered to be printed at the conclusion of his remarks.)

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, in order to avoid misunderstanding, I want to point out that I am not disputing the validity of the basic doctrine of intervention which has been relied upon by the United States on many occasions when the lives and the property of American citizens were under grave threat in foreign lands. That doctrine is well established in international law. I want to emphasize, however, that from the earliest days of our Republic the guiding principle in our foreign relations has been the doctrine of nonintervention rather than its opposite, the doctrine of intervention.

Prof. Charles E. Martin, in his treatise entitled "The Policy of the United States as Regards Intervention," which was published in 1921, states that European and American foreign policies in relation to intervention differ both historically and theoretically. He points out that intervention is a definite and well-established principle in the European political system and that it finds its origin in the theories of the balance of power. Thus he says at page 20:

> The idea of state-interest extended to a group of states, by means of alliances designed to preserve the balance of power, furnishes the key generally, to the history of the principle of intervention.

Opposed to the theory of intervention was the doctrine of nonintervention. It did not, however, gain much approval, except among the smaller states. It is obvious how difficult it was for such a principle to flourish in Europe. No sovereign state would agree not to intervene in the internal affairs of another state, when such abstinence might seem directly to involve its own existence; and nonintervention might have meant the ruin even of a large European state, so long as the system of alliances continued.

The idea of state-interest extended to a group of states, by means of alliances designed to preserve the balance of power, furnishes the key, generally, to the history of the principle of intervention.

The adoption of nonintervention as a deliberate and consistent policy was reserved to the United States; the wisdom of which became very real after an instructive experience with a European alliance and a narrow escape from being drawn into the European conflict during the French Revolution and the Napoleonic wars.

Professor Martin then says at page 68 of the work I have cited:

Some foreign policies develop casually without conscious direction. Others are the result of the discerning and guiding will of statesmen. The policy of nonintervention, while lacking an orderly plan of development, enjoyed the conscious and deliberate attention and direction of our ablest leaders. Its origin and adoption, then, is attributed to a conscious purpose, and not to circumstance or accident.

The principles of the doctrine of nonintervention have had wide popular approval as the proper cornerstone of our foreign policies. It has only been in the more recent years of our national history that our leadership has forsaken those principles. The consequences of that tendency can be reckoned in terms of billions of dollars of national indebtedness and ever lengthening rows of tombstones in our national cemeteries.

It has been in respect to our relations with the smaller nations in the Americas that the United States has most often departed from strict adherence to the doctrine of nonintervention. This started early in our history and developed into the so-called Monroe Doctrine which, today, is the cornerstone of the conduct of our foreign relations in relation to the nations of the Western Hemisphere.

The most significant of our interventions in the affair of nations in the Western Hemisphere was the intervention in Cuba.

It should be noted, however, that even that intervention followed passage of a joint resolution by the Congress. That resolution specifically authorized the President to use our Armed Forces in Cuba. Section 3 of the joint resolution stated:

That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed and empowered to use the entire land and naval forces of the United States, and to call into the actual service of the United States the militia of the several States, to such extent as may be necessary to carry these resolutions into effect.

It was passed by Congress on April 19, 1898, and was signed into law by President McKinley on April 20, 1898. It was followed on April 25 by a formal declaration of war on Spain.

American intervention in Cuba, which, as I have said, was the most striking departure from our policy of nonintervention, was based on authority from Congress. President McKinley asked and received that authority prior to ordering the Armed Forces of the United States into what was then the territory of Spain.

J. Reuben Clark, Jr., former solicitor of the Department of State, and, incidentally, I might say, a very distinguished citizen of the State of Utah, in a memorandum dated August 1912 to the Secretary of State, points out that from the time of President Jefferson the Executive has consistently declared that it possessed the right to protect with forces of the United States the lives and property of American citizens in foreign countries. Mr. Clark's memorandum points out, however, that there is a difference between intervention for the protection of American citizens and the taking of the Nation into war. Thus the memorandum opinion quotes the following from a statement by President Jefferson in 1805 in discussing Spanish depradations on our territory:

Considering that Congress alone is constitutionally invested with the power of changing our condition from peace to war, I have thought it my duty to await their authority for using force in any degree which could be avoided. I have barely instructed the officers stationed in the neighborhood of the aggressions, to protect our citizens from violence, to patrol within the borders actually delivered to us, and not to go out of them, but when necessary to repel an inroad, or to rescue a citizen, or his property.

There is also quoted in the memorandum I have cited the following paragraphs from a note written by Secretary of State Lewis Cass to Lord Napier, British Minister to Washington, regarding the proposed American participation in an intervention in China:

This proposition, looking to a participation by the United States in the existing hostilities against China, makes it proper to remind Your Lordship that, under the Constitution of the United States, the executive branch of the Government is not the war-making power. This exercise of that great attribute of sovereignty is vested in Congress, and the President has no authority to order aggressive hostilities to be undertaken.

Our naval officers have the right—it is their duty, indeed—to employ the forces under their command, not only in self-defense, but for the protection of the persons and property of our citizens when exposed to acts of lawless outrage, and this they have done both in China and elsewhere, and will do again when necessary. But military expeditions into the Chinese territory cannot be undertaken without the authority of the National Legislature.

The administration and its friends and apologists have gone to ridiculous extremes in their attempts to give a color of legal propriety to the President's usurpation of power in connection with the commitment of American Armed Forces in the war in Korea. In their efforts to find historical precedent to support the President's action they have indiscriminately cited many events in American history which in some way involved the use of armed force beyond the territorial limits of the United States. It is claimed that these events are precedents establishing a recognized and well-established practice now recognized as legitimate and proper.

A Department of State memorandum, dated July 3, 1950, on the subject of the authority of the President to repel the attack on Korea contains such a list. It is pointed out in this memorandum that the United States has throughout its history, upon orders of the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, and without congressional authorization, intervened to prevent violent and unlawful acts in other states from depriving the United States and its nationals of the benefits of international peace and security. Reference is then made to a tabulation of 85 instances of the use of American Armed Forces without a declaration of war which was incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for July 10, 1941, at pages 5930–5931. The State Department's memorandum also invites attention to the appendix to a pamphlet by James Grafton Rogers entitled "World Policing and the Constitution; an Inquiry Into the Powers of the President and Congress, Nine Wars and a Hundred Military Operations, 1789–1945," published in 1945 by the World Peace Foundation.

The Department of State memorandum of July 3, 1950, also contains certain quotations from a speech by former United States Senator Warren Austin which is reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Seventy-ninth Congress, first session, volume 91, July 26, 1945, pages 8064–8065. In that speech Senator Austin pointed out that he had seen three different compilations of occasions on which the Chief Executive had used the Armed Forces beyond the territory of the United States without any prior act of Congress. The Senator stated that one of these compilations listed no less than 150 such occasions.

On July 5, 1950, my colleague, the then junior Senator from Illinois, now the senior Senator [Mr. DOUGLAS], made a speech on this floor in which he attempted to justify the President in his action in ordering our Armed Forces into the Korean war without consulting Congress. The then junior Senator from Illinois condensed the various listings I have referred to and came up with a reduced list totaling 15.

I have taken the trouble to examine each one of the incidents in the various lists. In the majority they amounted to nothing more than the sending ashore of American seamen and marines to prevent injury to American citizens and their property, or to pursue and punish pirates or other lawless elements, or to exact reparations for wrongs committed against American commerce or the dignity and honor of the United States. On many occasions the landing forces amounted to little more than a dozen or so seamen or marines. On other occasions the landing force amounted to hundreds. In the case of the landings in China during the Boxer Rebellion, several thousand troops were sent ashore.

I have examined the historical events cited in several of these listings. Admittedly there is a general sort of similarity between many of the events cited from our historical past and the present intervention in Korea. Careful examination and study will bring out the fact, however, that practically without exception each one of the incidents cited in the various lists is clearly distinguishable from, and not in point with, the elements of fact and law surrounding the Korean intervention. As we say in the law: The cases which have been cited are not in point.

I have prepared a concise review of the 15 incidents cited by the Senator from Illinois, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement be inserted in the RECORD at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See exhibit I.)

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, an examination of that list and the remarks appearing therein will show how farfetched is the reasoning which seeks to regard them as legitimate precedents to support the President's claim to the power to order our Armed Forces to carry the burden of the war in Korea.

Let me interpolate that in many of these instances it seems there was a plain violation on the part of the President of the United States. No one called him to task. Congress did not do anything about the matter, and the incidents turned out all right for the United States.

Today, when situations which might result in great danger to our country are developing, it seems to me that it is dangerous to reason that simply because so many of these unauthorized actions have been committed, we should be governed by them as precedents.

Article II of the Constitution of the United States establishes the Executive Department of the Government of the United States. Section 2 of that article gives the President command over the Armed Forces of the United States. There is no language in article II or elsewhere in the Constitution which specifically confers on the President the power to declare or to make war.

Section 8 of article I, on the other hand, says:

> The Congress shall have the power * * * to declare war.

That provision of the Constitution of the United States is generally accepted and referred to as the war-making clause of the Constitution. As will be noted, it specifically and unequivocably reserves to the Congress the power "to declare war." Elsewhere in my statement today I have indicated four or five other places in the Constitution where Congress is given additional power to make war and to conduct the affairs of the country in case of war.

The Journal of Debates in the Constitutional Convention of 1787 as kept by James Madison, indicates that the war-making clause as originally presented to the Convention sought to empower the Congress to make war. After debate, however, the word "make" was changed to "declare" and the clause was adopted with that substitution. Thus this provision of the Constitution was made to read "The Congress shall have the power * * * to declare war."

The exchange of views in the Constitutional Convention which led to this change is both interesting and pertinent. The following is a quotation of that debate as reported by Mr. Madison:

> Mr. Pinckney opposed the vesting this power in the Legislature. Its proceedings were too slow. It would meet but once a year. The House of Representatives would be too numerous for such deliberations. The Senate would be the best depository, being more acquainted with foreign affairs and most capable of proper resolutions. If the States are equally represented in the Senate, so as to give no advantage to the large States, the power will notwithstanding be safe, as the small have their all at stake in such cases as well as the large States. It would be singular for one authority to make war and another peace.
> Mr. BUTLER. The objections against the Legislature lie in a vast degree against the Senate. He was for vesting the power in the President, who will have all the requisite qualities, and will not make war but when the Nation will support it.
> Mr. Madison and Mr. Gerry moved to insert "declare," striking out "make" war; leaving to the Executive the power to repel sudden attacks.
> Mr. Sharman thought it stood very well. The Executive should be able to repel and not commence war. "Make" is better than "declare," the latter narrowing the power too much.
> Mr. Gerry never expected to hear in a republic a motion to empower the Executive alone to declare war.
> Mr. ELSWORTH. There is a material difference between the cases of making war and making peace. It should be more easy to get out of war than into it. War also is a simple and overt declaration; peace attended with intricate and secret negotiations.
> Mr. Mason was against giving the power of war to the Executive because not safely to be trusted with it, or to the Senate because not so constructed as to be entitled to it. He was for clogging rather than facilitating war; but for facilitating peace. He preferred "declare" to "make."
> On the motion to insert "declare," in place of "make," it was agreed to.

In light of the legislative history of the war-making power in the Constitution of the United States as it was drafted in Convention and later adopted and ratified by the States, it is plain that the founding fathers were aware of the fact that legislative processes are sometimes slow in a republican form of government. It was largely for that reason that they proposed to empower the Executive to take action necessary to the immediate self-defense of the Nation in the event of sudden attack. It was not their intention, however, to empower the Executive to declare war; nor was it their intention to empower the Executive to make war except in self-defense of the Nation in cases of sudden and unanticipated attack.

On the afternoon of January 15, 1951, in the speech which the senior Senator from Illinois made on this floor, he sought to give a color of propriety to the President's claim to the authority to send our Army, Navy, and Air Force into action anywhere in the world without consulting the Congress. In an effort to bolster his thesis, the Senator from Illinois quoted from a book entitled "Our Chief Magistrate and His Power," by William Howard Taft, former President and Chief Justice of the United States, and father of our colleague, the Senior Senator from Ohio.

The Senator from Illinois lifted one sentence and a portion of another sentence from a paragraph on page 99 of William Howard Taft's work and quoted them out of context with the remainder of the paragraph in which they appeared. It was implied that thus the writings of the father of the senior Senator from Ohio were a refutation of the position now being taken by his son to the effect that the President did not have the constitutional power to order our Armies, our Navy, and our Air Force into war in Korea without consulting Congress.

The lead sentence of the paragraph quoted by the senior Senator from Illinois reads as follows:

> The President is the Commander and Chief of the Army and Navy and the militia when called into the service of the United States. Under this he can order the Army and Navy anywhere he will, if the appropriations furnish the means of transportation.

The remainder of the paragraph in which that sentence appears reads as follows:

> Of course, the instrumentality which this power furnishes gives the President an opportunity to do things which involve consequences that it would be quite beyond his power under the Constitution directly to effect. Under the Constitution only Congress has the power to declare war, but with the Army and the Navy the President can take action such as to involve the country in war and to leave Congress no option but to declare it or to recognize its existence. This was the charge made against President Polk in beginning the Mexican War. War as a legal fact, it was decided by the Supreme Court in prize cases, can exist by invasion of this country by a foreign enemy or by such an insurrection as occurred during the Civil War, without any declaration of war by Congress at all, and it is only in the case of a war of our aggression against a foreign country that the power of Congress must be affirmatively asserted to establish its legal existence.

It will be noted that the quotation I have read includes the two fragments quoted by the senior Senator from Illinois. It will be noted, too, that William Howard Taft said in part in that paragraph that the President apparently can take action such as to involve the country in war and to leave Congress no option but to declare it or to recognize its existence, and that thus the President is given an opportunity to do things which involve consequences that would be quite beyond his power under the Constitution directly to effect.

I may say at this point that that power should certainly be construed against the right of the Executive, under the circumstances of today, to take us into a war, or issue orders which would have the ultimate effect of putting us into war, without any declaration of war by Congress. It is a dangerous power, one which should never be allowed in this country. If it should finally be construed by a court of last resort that the President has the powers which he claims he has, we should then do something about limiting those powers for the sake of the future of the United States.

For the benefit of the RECORD, the paragraph from William Howard Taft's statement, which follows the paragraph I have just quoted, reads:

What constitutes an act of war by the land or naval forces of the United States is sometimes a nice question of law and fact. It really seems to differ with the character of the nation whose relations with the United States are affected. The unstable condition as to law and order of some of the Central American republics seems to create different rules of international law from those that obtain in governments that can be depended upon to maintain their own peace and order. It has been frequently necessary for the President to direct the landing of naval marines from United States vessels in Central America to protect the American consulate and American citizens and their property. He has done this under his general power as Commander in Chief. It grows not out of any specific act of Congress but out of that obligation, inferable from the Constitution, of the Government to protect the rights of an American citizen against foreign aggression, as in the Kotza incident, cited by Mr. Justice Miller in the Neagle case. In practice the use of the naval marines for such a purpose has become so common that their landing is treated as a mere local police measure, whereas if troops of the Regular Army are used for such a purpose, it seems to take on the color of an act of war.

The action in Korea is not a mere landing of American forces to protect the rights and property of American citizens. The action in Korea is war. It is terrible and bloody war on a large scale.

The Americans who are engaged in the fighting in Korea are soldiers, sailors, marines, and airmen numbering in the neighborhood of 200,000. The weapons they use are cannon and tanks and ships and planes and all of the other weapons of modern all-out warfare.

The President is waging war in Korea. It is an undeclared war into which the United States has been taken by the unilateral action of the President without consulting the Congress. The President's action in waging war in Korea without consulting Congress is an outright violation of the letter and the spirit of the Constitution of the United States.

I say to the Senate in all seriousness that if the President is now permitted to order American armies into Europe without consulting Congress, we will wake up one of these days and find that we have again been taken into all-out large-scale war on the order of the President in violation of the spirit as well as the letter of the Constitution.

EXHIBIT I

LIST OF 15 INTERVENTIONS BY THE ARMED FORCES OF THE UNITED STATES AND THEIR STATUS AS PRECEDENTS TO SUPPORT THE PRESIDENT'S CLAIM TO AUTHORITY TO SEND THE ARMED FORCES INTO FOREIGN COUNTRIES WITHOUT CONSULTING THE CONGRESS

NAVAL HOSTILITIES WITH FRANCE, 1798

On February 1, 1793, France declared war on England. The Republic of France claimed, according to the Franco-American Convention of 1778 and the 1778 Treaties of Alliance, Amity, and Commerce which had been negotiated with France prior to the overthrow of the monarchy, that the United States should assist them. However, on April 22, 1793, President Washington, on the advice of his Cabinet, which included Thomas Jefferson and Alexander Hamilton, issued his neutrality proclamation. When Citizen Edmond Genet, France's Minister to the United States, later organized privateering enterprises in America against England, he was forced to retire by President Washington.

On November 19, 1794, the Jay Treaty was signed between the United States and England. The French angrily vented their feelings by seizing American ships and manhandling their crews. Secretary of State Pickering, on June 21, 1797, reported that 316 vessels flying the American flag had been captured by French cruisers.

After John Adams became President in 1797, hoping to avoid war, he sent a commission of three men to France, Charles C. Pinckney, Elbridge Gerry, and John Marshall. The French Foreign Minister, Talleyrand, and his puppets insisted on a huge bribe and loan. When the news of this insult reached America and President Adams lay the dispatches from the American Envoys before Congress, designating the French go-betweens as X, Y, and Z, Americans angrily shouted:

"Millions for defense but not one cent for tribute."

In May and July of 1798 Congress authorized the capture of the armed ships of France. On June 13, 1798, commercial intercourse with France was suspended, and on July 7, 1798, Congress declared the treaties with France void, contending that the French Government had already violated their various provisions.

Acting on congressional authority, the small but courageous American Navy, assisted by privately owned vessels, launched an undeclared naval war against France, which lasted over 2 years and resulted in the capture of more than 80 armed French ships. General Washington was asked to command the American Army, anticipating an invasion of the United States.

Meanwhile, President Adams, with congressional concurrence, sent a commission consisting of William Vans Murray, William R. Davie, and Oliver Ellsworth to France. The United States insisted on $20,000,000 for damages done to American commerce. For 7 months the discussion was deadlocked. Ultimately, in September 1800, Napoleon agreed to forget the American obligations in the Treaty of 1778 if America would forget its claims against France. This was a small amount to pay in order to be released from the only formal treaty of alliance to which the United States was a party until the North Atlantic Pact was signed.

JEFFERSON'S EXPEDITION AGAINST THE BARBARY PIRATES, 1804

During the administration of Washington and John Adams America had been forced in humiliation to purchase treaties with three north African states.

Soon after Thomas Jefferson took the oath of office the Pasha of Tripoli, head of one of the three states, charged that he was not receiving his share of the tribute money. He chopped down the flag pole of the American consulate in Tripoli and made war on the United States. This insult to the Stars and Stripes was the culmination of many insulting incidents of pirate brutality against American seamen. President Jefferson sent warships into the Mediterranean Sea. In 1805, after several engagements in which our infant Navy made a brilliant account of itself, the United States compelled Tripoli to sign the most favorable treaty yet secured from her by any power. Our struggle with England, resulting in the embargo and the War of 1812, delayed further punishment of the other Barbary States. But in 1816 the United States dictated a treaty to Algiers at the mouth of cannon.

Meanwhile Jefferson had relied heavily on Congress. In his message to Congress on November 4, 1803, while referring to the capture of an American vessel by an armed ship of Morocco, he stated:

"It is for Congress to consider the provisional authorities that may be necessary to restrain the depredations of this power should they be continued."

The actions against the Barbary pirates were exactly what their name implies: They were expeditious to suppress piracy. They were taken by President Jefferson in full consultation with Congress.

Some years later, in the administration of President Monroe, the United States found it advisable to take action against pirates in the Caribbean area who had their havens on the islands of Cuba and Puerto Rico. This action, like that in Tripoli, was an action to suppress piracy.

On March 3, 1819, Congress passed an act entitled "An act to protect the commerce of the United States and punish the crime of piracy." This act provided:

"That the President of the United States be * * * authorized and requested to employ so many of the public armed vessels, as, in his judgment, the service may require, with suitable instructions to the commanders thereof, in protecting the merchant vessels of the United States and their crews from piratical aggressions and depradation."

Another act of December 1822, authorized an additional naval force for the suppression of piracy and for affording effectual protection to the citizens and commerce of the United States.

In a special message to the Senate on January 13, 1825, President Monroe informed the Senate that it would be impossible to suppress piracy in the Caribbean with naval action alone. He suggested that our forces be authorized either to pursue the escaping pirates into the settled as well as the unsettled parts of the island from whence they issue, or take reprisal on the property of the inhabitants of the islands on which the pirates found hiding and shelter, or blockade the ports of those islands.

In his request for this authority the President said in part—and I quote from his message to the Senate:

"It will be obvious that neither of these measures can be resorted to in a spirit of amity with Spain otherwise than in a firm belief that neither the Government of Spain nor the government of either of the islands has the power to suppress that atrocious practice, and that the United States interposed their aid for the accomplishment of an object which is of equal importance to them as well as to us.

"Acting on this principle, the facts which justify the proceeding being universally known and felt by all engaged in commerce in that sea, it may fairly be presumed that neither will the Government of Spain nor the government of either of those islands complain of a resort to either of those measures or to all of them, should such resort be necessary. It is therefore suggested that a power commensurate with either resource be granted to the Executive, to be exercised according to his discretion and as circumstances may imperiously require."

Neither the expeditions against the Barbary pirates in 1804, nor the expeditions against the pirates in the Caribbean a few years later, are proper precedents for the President's action in ordering our troops into the Korean war or onto the European Continent without consulting Congress.

THE SEMINOLE WAR, 1817

In December 1817, President Monroe commissioned Gen. Andrew Jackson to command American troops in chastising the Seminole Indians.

Jackson advanced into the Spanish possessions of Florida and in a few weeks fighting defeated the Indians, executed two renegade British subjects on charges of inciting the Indians, seized every important post in Florida except St. Augustine, and depossessed the Spanish Governor. Had not Spain been then engaged in the wars of independence with her Latin-American colonies, it is very likely that war would have resulted from this incident.

Although Jackson may have gone beyond the needs of the occasion, the expedition itself was legally justifiable under international law as an act of self-preservation grounded on imminent and clear and present danger. In that respect, let me quote the following paragraph from pages 24 and 25 of the Doctrine of Intervention by Henry G. Hodges:

"It was the preservation of our people and our institutions that prompted Jackson's interventions in Florida. The Spanish authorities in that country were either unable or unwilling to prevent the semicivilized Indians from crossing into the United States on marauding expeditions, and then returning to Spanish territory where they felt safe from pursuit on the part of American troops.

"Although it is very probable that the intervention was justified in this instance, nevertheless a State cannot intervene forcibly where the Central Government is making decided efforts to put down the threatening conditions, but due to great difficulties is momentarily unsuccessful. Self-preservation in all these cases must be imminent and clear from the fact. It cannot be regarded as a just principle when its results are remote or indirect."

At first the entire Cabinet agreed with President Monroe, with the exception of one, that Jackson had committed an unauthorized and unjustifiable act of war against Spain. Secretary of State John Quincy Adams held out, however, for a defiant course toward Spain. Adams induced the President not to discipline the general.

The Florida raid was critically viewed in Congress. A Senate committee conducted an investigation. It reported that some of the Members began to carry arms after Jackson allegedly threatened to cut off the ears of anyone who reported against him. However, after a 27-day debate in Congress, four resolutions condemning him were defeated.

Jackson's expedition into Florida was a measure to put a stop to the depredations of Indians and desperados.

POLK'S OCCUPATION OF DISPUTED TEXAS-MEXICAN BORDER TERRITORY, 1846

In reference to "Polk's occupation in 1846 of disputed Texas-Mexican territory," historians tell us that President Polk sent Gen. Zachary Taylor with American troops into the disputed territory within a provokingly short distance of Mexican troops. The Mexican troops attacked the American soldiers, and Polk, on March 11, 1846, urged the Congress to recognize the existence of hostility and take steps for the prosecution of the war. Two days later, on March 13, 1846, Congress formally declared war on Mexico. Several months later, during the Mexican War, Congressman Abraham Lincoln introduced his famous "spot resolutions," which questioned the assertion of the President that hostilities had begun on American territory.

The wars between Mexico and its rebelling State of Texas placed a very serious strain on the theretofore friendly relations between Mexico and the United States. Relations between the two countries did not improve during the period of the Texas Republic, and anti-American feeling really became acute in Mexico when, on December 29, 1845, Texas was admitted to the Union as a State. The squabble over the border between Texas and Mexico was but one aspect of the whole situation incident to the fixing of the southern borders of the United States.

The occupation of the disputed Texas-Mexican border territory in 1846 was not, in my view, a sound precedent on which to lay the President's claim to the right to wage war in Korea and send troops to Europe without consulting Congress.

INTERVENTION IN SAMOA, 1840–41, 1888, 1899

In 1841 when visiting one of the Samoan Islands, Lieutenant Commander Hudson of the U. S. S. Peacock demanded the surrender of the native who had killed a white man. The native chief not only refused to give up the offender but also defied the American military power. A landing party was sent in protected by the ship's guns. The natives scattered inland and their towns and villages were burned without opposition. Apparently this was meant as a lesson to the natives to preserve the lives of the white men and impress upon them that America was a world power with military strength.

In 1888–89, following a native revolt, a German commander landed forces to protect, it was claimed, German plantations. American ships were present in Samoan waters to protect American interests. For several days both German, American, and BBritish seamen in the Apia Harbor were glaring at each other over their guns. A disasterous hurricane in December 1889, wrecked most of the ships and thereby helped to terminate possible hostilities between the rival powers.

In February 1899, 80 American officers and men were landed from the U. S. S. Philadelphia, in Samoa, where an insurrection had arisen as to the succession to the throne. This trouble arose in the vicinity of Vailele, Samoa. The Americans were joined by British troops and a short skirmish was had with the natives. The primary reason for the landing was to protect American citizens and interests.

USE ON NAVAL FORCES IN CHINA, 1891

In August 1891 in the midst of a civil war in Chile between the supporters of President Balmaceda and the liberal faction, known as the Congressional Party, Rear Admiral George Brown, commander of the United States South Pacific station, ordered a landing force of 67 seamen and 37 marines from the U. S. S. San Francisco and the U. S. S. Baltimore to protect the United States Consulate at Valparaiso, and the women and children who had taken refuge in it. The landing force remained on shore 3 days, August 28, 29, and 30, 1891.

This incident cannot be compared with the intervention in Korea nor can it properly be cited as precedent to support the ordering of American armies to Europe without the consent of Congress.

BOXER REBELLION IN CHINA, 1900

During and after the Boxer Rebellion in China in 1900, American troops were sent to the various parts of the Chinese Empire to protect American lives and property. In addition to having two Marine detachments protecting the American Legation, the United States furnished 2,500 soldiers to the International Rescue Expedition which on August 14, 1900, relieved the besieged legations at Peking.

John W. Foster in his book entitled "American Diplomacy in the Orient," published in 1903, sets the intervention in China in its proper perspective.

Thus he says at pages 419 and 420:

"Events that startled the world followed swiftly. A column of naval troops marched overland to open up communications with the legations, and military forces were hurried forward from the American Army in the Philippines and by the other treaty powers from the nearest foreign post. The Taku forts were occupied by the allied forces after a few hours' bombardment, the American admiral declining, however, to take part in it, as he held it to be an act of war, and his instructions were to use his forces only for the protection of American interests; but it proved to be a wise military precaution, as the Chinese Government was then under control of the Boxers, and its forces were cooperating with them against the foreigner. Tientsin was attacked by the Chinese troops in large numbers, and the foreign residents were saved from slaughter only by the timely arrival of the allied forces. News from Peking told of the murder of the German minister and the siege of the legations, succeeded by the frightful rumors of the extermination of the diplomatic corps and all foreigners in the capital."

I want to quote further from Mr. Foster's book. Thus he says on page 422:

"In 1900 the American forces were sent to China to protect American citizens and their interest in extreme peril at a time when the authority of the Chinese Government was suspended and unable to give them protection."

Even after finding such justification for the intervention in China in 1900, Mr. Foster nevertheless says, and I quote from pages 421 and 422:

"The dispatch of a division of the American Army, composed of all arms of the service and fully equipped for a campaign was one of the most extreme acts of Executive authority in the history of the United States. It has been seen that when the Secretary of State was requested by the representatives of Great Britain and France in 1857 to cooperate with them in an expedition to Tientsin, he replied that, although the objects sought to be gained by the United States were the same as those entertained by the allies, the executive branch of the Government was not the war-making power, and that military expeditions into Chinese territory could not be undertaken without the authority of Congress. Doubtless that body would have been consulted by the President had it been in session when the crisis came in 1900; but emergency was great, and if the Government of the United States was to participate in the relief of its minister and citizens besieged at Peking, no time was to be lost."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT'S INTERVENTION IN PANAMA, 1903

When Theodore Roosevelt intervened in Panama in 1903 it was alleged that the obvious reason was to permit the Panamanian forces to successfully revolt against Colombia in order for the United States to acquire a right-of-way for the Panama Canal.

During the uprising from November 4 to 6, 1903, landing parties were sent ashore from the U. S. S. Nashville and U. S. S. Dixie to protect American interests, citizens, and property; but no shots were fired. It was a bloodless revolution, and American troops did not engage in military action.

The first of many American landings of Armed Forces in Panama occurred in 1856. This and subsequent landings were made, however, under the terms of article 35 of the treaty of 1846 between the United States and the Republic of New Granada. Through that treaty the United States undertook to—and I quote from article 35:

"Guarantee, positively and efficaciously, to New Granada, by the present stipulation the perfect neutrality of the before-mentioned isthmus, with the view that the free transit from the one to the other sea may not be interrupted or embarrassed in any future time while this treaty exists."

President Polk, in transmitting the treaty of 1846 to the Senate, pointed out that the guaranties contained in article 35 were necessary in order to secure for the world a passage across the Isthmus which would be free of wars and revolutions. It was under this specific treaty authority that the United States undertook on many occasions to maintain order and peace in the Isthmus of Panama.

Theodore Roosevelt's action in Panama, even though it may have been motivated by the desire to secure a way for the Panama Canal, is not a proper precedent for Korea.

It is the slenderest kind of thread on which to try to justify the President's claim to the right to order troops to Europe in large numbers without consulting the Congress.

SANTO DOMINGO, 1904

In January 1904 a revolution was going on in the Dominican Republic. The U. S. S. Detroit was sent to the north coast to protect American lives and property. The American commander, A. C. Dillingham, joined with the British commander, who was sent there for the same purpose and established a cordon on the outside of, and around, the entire town of Puerto Plata. The American troops also protected the interests of British nationals in Sosua and Santo Domingo City during the revolutionary fighting.

The intervention in Santo Domingo was another instance where American landing forces were used in North America to enforce a prohibition of fighting in the districts containing American citizens and property.

NICARAGUA, 1899, 1910, 1912, 1926

There were several landings during these dates by American forces in Nicaragua in order to, it was claimed, protect the lives and property of the American citizens. Landings were made at Bluefields, Corinto, San Juan del Sur, and other places where Americans had interests.

The landing in 1899, during the Reyes insurrection, was a joint British-American operation, for the purpose of protecting life and property. Troops were landed on the petition of foreign merchants whose property and lives were in danger.

President Taft, in his lectures on Our Chief Magistrate and His Powers, had this to say regarding the intervention in Nicaragua during his administration:

"In Nicaragua in my administration an insurrection had led to the immurement of American citizens by insurrectos and the threatened destruction of American property. The President of Nicaragua, whom we had recognized and whose minister we had received, called upon us to protect our own citizens and their property because he was unable to render them the protection which their treaty rights gave them. This led to the landing of marines, and quite a campaign, which resulted in the maintenance of law and order and the elimination of the insurrectos. This was not an act of war because it was done at the request and with the consent of the lawful authorities of the territory where it took place."

In that and other cases where United States troops intervened in Nicaragua by executive action, it was invariably done to protect Americans and their property during revolutionary activities. It can hardly be said that those actions are precedent upon which to justify the President's usurpation of the war-making power of Congress to the extent of involving the United States in all-out war in Asia. Nor can it be said with intellectual honesty that the interventions in Nicaragua are precedents for the President's claim to power to send armies to Europe in anticipation of possible future war in Europe.

HAITI, 1914

In 1914, during an outbreak of revolutionary forces under Oreste Zamor against President Oreste of Haiti, American seamen and Marines were called to guard the American Legation and protect American interests. There was several months of guerrilla warfare. Zamor was overthrown later in the year. However, while the American forces were there, they did not take either side. They were there only to guard the American Legation and protect American interests.

WILSON'S INTERVENTION AT VERACRUZ, 1914

In 1914, General Huerta overthrew the Madero regime in Mexico. President Wilson refused to recognize the de facto president, charging that he was responsible for the murder of Madero. Huerta retaliated with acts of reprisal on American citizens, which culminated in the arrest on April 9, 1914, of the Navy Paymaster and seven seamen, who had just bought some cases of gasoline from a German merchant and were loading them into the whaleboat of the U. S. S. Dolphin at Tampico, Mexico. The unpleasantness of the situation was increased on April 11 when a mail orderly of the U. S. S. Minnesota at Vera Cruz was arrested in the post office of that port and publicly marched to jail.

Eventually matters grew worse, until on April 20, 1914, President Wilson referred the matter to Congress in a special message reviewing the Tampico and Veracruz insults along with others. He asked the approval of Congress for his intended course in using the Armed Forces of the country, "in such a way and to such an extent as may be necessary to obtain from General Huerta and his adherents the fullest recognition of the rights and integrity of the United States."

Congress gave its sanction by a large majority of both Houses. Immediately the President directed the commanders in Mexican waters to take action and on April 21st forces were landed. Hostilities began immediately and continued until April 23rd, when Veracruz was in the hands of the Americans. It looked as if there would be another war with Mexico. However, the three great powers of South America, Argentina, Brazil and Chile, offered their good services to the American Government in an effort at mediation and on May 20, a peace conference was assembled. Immediately after Huerta resigned as President of Mexico, on July 15, the emergency passed over.

SANTO DOMINGO, 1916

On March 30th and during June and July of 1916 a revolution against the Government of Jose Burdas Valdes, President of the Dominican Republic began at Lavega, Santiago. In June 1916, Capt. Russell of the U. S. S. South Carolina lying at Puerto Plata, notified the President of San Domingo that a bombardment of Puerto Plata would be answered by forces under his orders. Nine days later Government troops began a careful bombardment of the town. Soon afterward the United States ships opened fire on the Valdes batteries. The shelling of the city stopped. Secretary of State Bryan approved the action of Captain Russell and the Americans informed the Dominican Governor that the city must be a neutral zone. This entire action was taken in order to protect American lives and property in San Domingo.

THE PURSUIT OF PANCHO VILLA, 1916

Early in 1916, General Carranza, having seized power in Mexico, gave promise of establishing an orderly government. President Wilson gave the new regime a de facto recognition. However, Carranza failed to control the outlaw Pancho Villa who persecuted Americans and destroyed American property in Mexico. Finally he led a raid across the border into Columbus, New Mexico. President Wilson, with Carranza's permission, sent an American expeditionary force, under Gen. John J. Pershing into Mexico. Pershing and his men failed to capture Villa. The American Army was withdrawn as World War I loomed, in 1917.

INTERVENTION IN RUSSIA—ARCHANGEL, SIBERIA, 1919

During the latter part of World War I, in 1918, in order to protect American and Allied interests from the Bolshevists, American troops to the number of 5,100 were dispatched to Archangel, Siberia, where they were based until July 1919. Again, on July 30, 1919, American marines were landed at Tyutuke Bay, a short distance from Vladivostok, Siberia, to protect American interests. The landing party was returned aboard ship the following day.

Professors Harley Farnsworth MacNair and Donald F. Lach, in their excellent textbook, Modern Far Eastern International Relations, published in 1950, point out that the allied interventions in Siberia in the period 1918–20 grew out of the Russian revolutions of March and November 1917 which had brought about the collapse of the eastern front against Germany and the fear that Austrian and German prisoners of war then in Siberia might be used in Russia on behalf of the Central Powers. The Allies hoped to restore the eastern front and were anxious to help an army of about 50,000 Czechoslovaks who were in Siberia and anxious to get into the fight against Germany and Austria, their old enemies. On June 29, 1918, they seized Vladivostok.

Certain patriotic elements in Russia refused to accept the Bolshevik usurpation of power. The largest anti-Bolshevik force collected around Admiral Kolchak in Siberia and established a far-eastern republic. The Allied Supreme War Council decided to send troops to Siberia to cooperate with these anti-Bolshevik Russians. The American troops which participated in this venture sailed from England on August 26, 1918. They were withdrawn from Siberia in August 1919, leaving behind only a small detachment of graves registration troops.

Professors MacNair and Lach note that President Wilson was hesitant about American participation in the Siberian expedition. Thus they say on page 207 of their book.

"On July 6, after it had become clear that, with or without the cooperation of the United States, intervention was practically certain, President Wilson agreed to carefully limited participation. Over the date of the 17th he personally wrote an aide-memoire which Secretary Lansing made known to the Allied Ambassadors in Washington."

Professors MacNair and Lach then go on to say:

"President Wilson's friendship for Russia; his doubts of the value, and fears of the dangers, of intervention; and his determination to safeguard Russian interests to the best of his ability were frankly stated. Analysis of the Wilson aide-memoire, of the correspondence which followed, and of the actions of Maj. Gen. Wilson S. Graves, commander of the American forces which were sent to Siberia in August and September following, leads to the conclusion that the President, personally, was unalterably opposed to a military occupation of that area by any of the Allied Powers and that he hoped American forces might in part serve as a brake upon the chariots of war which were being sent thither."

CITATION OF JOSEPH DOTO AND OTHERS FOR CONTEMPT

During the delivery of Mr. WATKINS' speech,

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question, provided he does not lose the floor?

Mr. WATKINS. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. I wonder whether the Senator would allow the Senator from Michigan to ask the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] if he would consent to put over until tomorrow the vote on the pending motion, which was to have been voted upon this afternoon. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee if he would object to putting it over until tomorrow, following the vote already set for tomorrow on the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY].

Mr. WATKINS. If I may yield without losing the floor, I am glad to yield for that purpose, with the further understanding that this discussion may be placed at the end of my remarks, in order to preserve the unbroken continuity of my speech.

Mr. FERGUSON. Certainly. The Senator understands, of course, that the resolution to be voted upon tomorrow involves the question now being debated. As I understand, there are two more speeches to follow, which would make the vote on the pending motion late. Neither the Senator from Michigan nor other Senators are anxious to have a delay. However, it is felt that Senators ought to have an opportunity to read the RECORD. A day's delay is just as good as 2 or 3. The only reason why the Senator from Michigan mentioned Thursday in the earlier discussion was that he felt there would be no session on Wednesday, and therefore he suggested Thursday, the following day. Would the Senator consent to the matter being put over until after the vote is had on the Wherry resolution tomorrow, which action has been unanimously agreed upon?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, a number of speeches are to be made today, so I do not know whether we can get to a vote on the matter tonight anyway. I would be willing to have my matter put over with the understanding that it be voted upon immediately following the vote on the Wherry resolution tomorrow; and also that the Tony Acardo and other contempt citations which have been voted upon by the committee this afternoon, be voted on at the same time tomorrow.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator from Michigan understands all the citations will come up at the same time.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me for an observation?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. WATKINS. I want it to be clearly understood that in making the statement I made this afternoon I am not opposed to the citing of the individual mentioned for contempt and for prosecution. I do not know enough about the facts really to make a sound decision. Inasmuch as we had the unanimous-consent agreement for a vote to be had tomorrow at 2 o'clock, I felt that Senators who were in the same position I am in, who have not given an expression on this vital problem which is now before the country, and the world, would be practically cut off without any opportunity whatever to speak on the floor of the Senate, unless we use the opportunity we now have today to take part in the discussion.

I think the matter submitted by the Senator from Tennessee should go to the Committee on the Judiciary, and as a member of that committee I certainly agree with the chairman that it will be reported out promptly—at least that we will make a quick decision and get the question back to the Senate. I take that position particularly in view of the fact that several legal questions have been raised. The statement of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] also inclined me to look upon the matter in that way, when he said that the special committee know all the facts, and they know whether these individuals are guilty of contempt or not. The committee heard the facts, and they are in very much the position of a prosecutor. That is why I thought the matter should go to the Committee on the Judiciary for decision.

Mr. KEFAUVER. If it were not for the fact that several speeches are to be made tonight I would not agree to delaying action on the resolutions until tomorrow. But it is now perfectly apparent that they cannot be taken up until tomorrow anyway. So, if it is agreed that the vote on the Joe Adonis resolution and resolutions dealing with other witnesses shall follow the vote on the Wherry resolution tomorrow, that will be agreeable to me.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, as acting majority leader, I will say that course is perfectly agreeable to me. But I have asked the clerk to see if he can secure the immediate presence of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], so we may secure his ideas on the matter, as he seemed to be the one who felt that a delay was necessary. If the Senator from Tennessee will withhold his request for unanimous consent until we can hear from the Senator from Nevada, I shall not ask for a quorum.

Mr. President, I am now advised that the Senator from Nevada is agreeable to the suggestion which is made that this first resolution which has been before the Senate today, and which was reported by the Senator from Tennessee, the chairman of the Special Crime Investigating Committee, may be acted upon immediately after the action of the Senate on the Wherry resolution tomorrow pursuant to the unanimous-consent agreement now in force.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say that the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary has preference. It comes first. He is so advised by the Parliamentarian.

Mr. HOLLAND. The acting majority leader will also communicate to the Senator from Nevada the information that it is the expectation of the Senator from Tennessee immediately after the vote on the Adonis resolution to call up other similar resolutions which he has filed and which he had intended to take up today if possible. I ask that the Senator from Tennessee supplement this statement if there is anything further he wishes to say.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes. I had understood that the unanimous-consent request would include the other resolutions; that they would also be acted upon following the one with respect to Adonis.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no unanimous-consent agreement pending now.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, as the Senator from Florida understood, a unanimous-consent request is going to be made, and the Senator from Florida will say that he would have no objection to it in the form stated by the Senator from Michigan provided it were approved by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], and he now understands the Senator from Nevada has agreed as to the Adonis resolution.

Mr. FERGUSON. Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution referred to by the Senator from Tennessee be considered by a vote immediately following the disposal of the Wherry resolution and all incidental motions to that resolution tomorrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Chair correctly understands the request of the Senator from Michigan, it is that the matter of the contempt proceedings will follow the disposal of the Wherry resolution tomorrow; and the question will recur on the McCarran motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, as now pending.

Mr. FERGUSON. That is all it is; yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and without objection, it is so ordered.

NOMINATION OF DEFENSE PRODUCTION ADMINISTRATOR

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, by agreement with the minority leader, it has been suggested, provided there is no objection, that the Senate consider the Executive Calendar, as in executive session, and confirm the nomination of William H. Harrison, of New York, to be Defense Production Administrator. I move, therefore, that the Senate proceed as in executive session——

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is the Senator referring to the Harrison nomination?

Mr. HOLLAND. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I should like to have it go over.

Mr. HOLLAND. I withdraw my motion, Mr. President.

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, the debate on foreign policy which has been in progress now for some time has, I believe, been beneficial to all concerned. Its particular merit has been to lift our foreign policy out of the realm of personalities into the field of issues and real progress has been made.

One important issue has been quite clearly defined. That issue is whether the President should seek the advice of Congress on the question of sending troops to Europe now, or whether his discretion should be subject to the consent of Congress. Apparently the President is agreeable to the idea that it is proper for Congress to give him its advice about this question, leaving to him the full responsibility for making the final decision. He is not willing, however, to accept the principle that the consent of the Congress is necessary to validate his decision. In other words, he does not agree that his decision in this matter must be subject to the approval of Congress.

Personally, I agree with the position of the President. I do not agree with the proposal of the minority leader. The Congress has the right and power to raise the Armed Forces, but the President has the responsibility for the command of those forces. If in the exercise of his best judgment the defense of this country requires the sending of troops to Europe, he has the power and the duty to do so. Congress, of course, can refuse to appropriate the money for the troops but that is a decision for which Congress must take the responsibility. In the long run decisions on military strategy are best left to the Executive. That is the plain intent of our constitutional system. It would be dangerous for our future welfare to change the underlying principle simply because a strong minority or even a majority of the Congress may lack confidence in the wisdom of the Executive in some particular instance such as the present one.

Mr. President, aside from the question of the proper relations of the Executive and the Congress there is, of course, the question of the substantive decision itself. In other words, regardless of who makes the decision and what procedure is followed, the important question is what is the best policy for us to follow. There have been marked differences of views expressed in the Senate as well as by private individuals in recent weeks.

We have heard the only living ex-President of our country advocates a policy directly contrary to the present official policy of our Government. Other prominent men have disagreed with both policies and the rest of us are left to choose among them or to try to invent some new solution. It is this apparent babel of voices which almost persuaded me not to add to the confusion by making another speech on the subject, but yet, under the circumstances as we find them, it would seem to be our duty to try to clarify the issues and to find, as best we can, a course of action which at least a clear majority of us can support.

Another observation that I wish to make, relative to the nervousness that presently afflicts us, especially in Washington, is that we should remember that we and our democratic allies have had reverses before. In fact, it is characteristic of free self-governing peoples that they suffer reverses in the initial stages of every war. That is because we hate war and are always reluctant to prepare for war until forced to do so by an attack. Let us not forget that on December 7, 1941, we thought Pearl Harbor was the blackest day in our history. In 1914, as well as in 1940, the British and the French suffered disastrous reverses and yet they have survived. The initial advantage in all wars is with the aggressor, and yet the free peoples have prevailed in the last two world conflicts in spite of their initial reverses.

I do not by any means wish to leave the impression that we should be complacent, or that our success is inevitable, in the present struggle. I merely suggest that we should not, in a panic of despair and an atmosphere of recrimination, make ill-considered and hasty decisions. On the contrary, we must approach the problems with a calm, unemotional, and objective attitude, and with the most serious consideration of our long-term interests.

At the outset there is one matter which I believe we can agree upon and which I think may clear away one tiny corner of the confusion. We should recognize in the beginning that we are matching with and strategy with an adversary who accepts no rules, and has no honor, no moral code, no respect for word or contract; who ridicules religion and believes that any means justifies the end. With such an adversary, any agreement or policy adopted today may look foolish a month from today. In other words, by bitter experience we have learned that promisory agreements with the masters of the Kremlin cannot be relied upon. Agreements which we made in good faith with Russia during and after the war, had they been carried out in good faith as intended, would have resulted in a very different world from that which we have today. Our leaders who made those agreements, however, now look improvident and foolish and are condemned from every side.

The objective of our foreign policy is, in a few words, the maintenance of peace and the freedom and security of our people. The difficult question is what measures or policies are most likely to assure this objective. Broadly speaking, there may be said to be three policies that have been advanced in recent weeks of debate in the Senate and by private citizens. First, the limitation of our commitments to the defense of the Western Hemisphere with emphasis upon air and sea power. Second, the so-called Truman doctrine of opposing aggression in every area where it appears. Third, participation in the creation of a land army in western Europe, in addition to the defense of the Western Hemisphere. One may perhaps call this the Truman doctrine with limitations.

A foreign policy, of course, cannot be adequately described in so few words, but I think these brief descriptions are sufficient to give us a basis for discussion. One mistake that we are often prone to make, in dealing with matters of the greatest complexity, is to oversimplify the proposed solution. It is human nature to want to find quickly a simple, clear answer to the most difficult problem so that we can stop worrying about what we should do and get about doing it. We Americans are an impatient people and we cannot understand why our leaders do not tell us right off just exactly, in detail, what we should do and quit arguing about it. With a little reflection, I believe it becomes apparent that, in a matter as difficult as combating the imperialism of the Russian Politburo, there is no simple blueprint for action, and it is a dangerous illusion to accept one even if it is offered.

In dealing with an enemy as ruthless, as resourceful, and as unpredictable as the Politburo, we must be prepared on the one hand to meet wholly unexpected moves and at the same time to agree upon certain positive objectives of our own from which we must not allow ourselves to be diverted. This means that, although we agree upon broad policy objectives, we cannot follow blindly and stubbornly a preconceived pattern, but, on the contrary, we should be able to adapt ourselves promptly to changing circumstances. There must be an element of flexibility in any policy.

An example of what I have in mind is the situation that developed in Korea. So long as the objective was to resist the aggression of North Korea and to restore the integrity of the Republic of South Korea, we were carrying out a program of the United Nations which was consistent with the Truman doctrine. At the time President Truman ordered troops to Korea, there was general approval of his actions in the Congress and among the people. The current outspoken critics of the situation were not so outspoken then. However, when Red China entered the war, the entire character of the struggle changed. Purely as a military matter, the undertaking in Korea at that moment became untenable. We should not undertake at this time a major land war with China. If this is the beginning of world war III, we must not forget that the Kremlin is the primary enemy and China merely a satellite. It is far wiser to recognize the hard military facts of the situation and to withdraw from Korea than to persist in an undertaking which is now quite a different one from that which we began in June. In spite of the valid principle which we sought to support, we should not jeopardize the military security of the free world by pursuing an impracticable undertaking.

Before discussing the three broad policies mentioned a moment ago, we should recall for a moment the background of the present conflict. In the war with Hitler's Nazi Germany, we and our western allies not only did a large part of the fighting, but we also generously and wholeheartedly furnished enormous quantities of war material to Russia; thousands of tanks, planes, trucks, guns, ships, and tons of food. At one point even Stalin acknowledged the decisive importance of our contribution to Russian survival.

During and after the war we made agreements with Russia, in good faith, designed to reestablish peace and freedom in the war-torn world. We assumed that after such a long and devastating struggle, the masters of the Kremlin would be anxious to lighten the crushing burdens of the Russian people. We expected that the Kremlin would want to give the tired, long-suffering Russian masses shoes, warm clothes, good housing, and nourishing food; not only because it would be the humane thing to do, but as a reward for their sacrifices during the war.

However, we all know that instead of seeking to give the Russian people some of the good things of life the Kremlin tightened the screws and lashed the defenseless people into ever-increasing efforts and sacrifices for the creation of a monstrous war machine. At the same time, a vicious and relentless campaign of sabotage, subversion, and threats was directed against Russia's former allies.

Our leaders have been severely criticized for misjudging the character and intentions of the Politburo during and immediately after the war. Our hindsight, of course, tells us that we should not have trusted the Russians. However, in America we are accustomed to taking men at their word, and I submit that it is almost beyond the capacity of civilized people to understand, even now, let alone anticipate then, the savage and relentless attack of the Russians upon allies who so recently had saved them from annihilation.

It seems to me that the only logical alternative to the course of action we did follow—that is, of trusting the Russians—was, in distrust of them, to assume and maintain a position of military strength from which to deal with them. In other words, even had our leaders correctly judged the character and intentions of the Politburo in 1945, would we have been willing to make the sacrifices necessary to meet that challenge? How long would our people have been willing to keep the boys in uniform in foreign lands and pay the taxes required to support them, even though our leaders may have thought it the wise thing to do? We now find ourselves, belatedly, preparing our defenses, creating a military potential by which we hope to deter the Russians. But this is only after a disastrous military reversal.

Regardless of what might have been, we are now confronted with ever bolder aggression by the Communists, and we must agree upon a course of action. The first of the proposed policies, which I mentioned a moment ago, calls for the limitation of our commitments to the defense of the Western Hemisphere, with emphasis upon air and sea power, and was advocated recently by ex-President Hoover and former Ambassador Kennedy. More recently, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] advocated a program quite similar, with some extensions of our responsibilities to what he called island bases and to such key places as the Suez Canal and certain strategic airfields. The all-important distinction between the position of these gentlemen and the third policy mentioned above, is the policy toward Western Europe. The Hoover-Kennedy view would prevent the supplying of ground troops to a European army for the defense of Western Europe. This view, in short, would abandon Western Europe to the tender mercies of the Kremlin. Although some of the advocates of this position seek to deny that this is the intention or would be the result, I am unable to agree with their reasoning. It seems clear to me that if we refuse not only to make an equitable and fair contribution to the ground forces of a European army, but also fail to take the leadership in organizing it, we will, in effect, have abandoned those people to domination by the Kremlin. I believe that such a course is dangerous to our security and is morally dishonorable. It is dangerous to our security because the great industrial potential of Europe would fall to the Russians. It is dishonorable because it repudiates obligations to friends and allies and denies our debt to all those generations of Europeans who struggled through the centuries to bring liberty and justice to mankind.

I believe that our foreign policy should revolve around the basic assumption that the preservation of Western Europe from domination by Moscow is essential to our security and to the long-term objective of establishing, eventually, a peaceful world of freemen. We must help protect Europe, but not for sentimental reasons. We must help protect Western Europe because the best military brains we have believe that our own physical defense would be gravely jeopardized if the industrial power of Europe should be merged with the manpower of Russia and her satellites. This reason should be decisive even to those among us who regard themselves as being hard-headed, practical realists. Furthermore, and of equal importance to me, we are morally bound to protect Europe by all reasonable means at our disposal. We are morally bound not only by such formal agreements as the Atlantic Treaty, duly ratified by the Senate, but also by our historical relationship to the peoples of Western Europe. These nations—England, France, Germany, Italy, to mention only a few—are the source, the fountain head of our civilization. All our forebears came from these lands. Our institutions of government, our religious principles, our system of law, our sense of justice, our regard for the dignity of man, our sense of fair play, all derived from the peoples of these lands. To abandon them without a struggle would be final proof to the world of the moral bankruptcy of our Nation.

To return for a moment to the question of military and industrial potential, today the steel production capacity of the United States is approximately 95,000,000 tons; of Western Europe, including Great Britain, about 60,000,000 tons; and of Russia and her satellites nearly 35,000,000 tons, although the latter is an estimate. In any case, at present we and our allies have an enormous advantage in the production of this basic all-important war material. However, if the 60,000,000-ton capacity of Western Europe is transferred to Russia, we would have a bare equality in this strategic material, but since Russia would then have an overwhelming manpower, we would be at a dangerous disadvantage in the ultimate contest. If Western Europe should fall, Russia would have the skilled manpower of the Germans, the French, and the Belgians to make the machines of war—guns, tanks, ships, rockets, and guided missiles—in addition to virtually an unlimited supply of expendable human beings. If anyone doubts that they would be generously expended, he should recall the use of masses of Russian infantry against the Germans or the recent slaughter of the Chinese in Korea under Russian direction.

One of the arguments upon which Mr. Hoover and Mr. Kennedy rely very heavily is that it is our primary duty, not only to ourselves but also to the free world, to withdraw to the Western Hemisphere and build up impregnable military strength in order that we may be the bastion of freedom. The idea seems to be that when the Communist world begins to crumble in the distant future, we will sally forth to reestablish freedom and civilization. This thought seems to me to be a rationalization of a desired course of action rather than a serious and genuine argument. It is too obviously an attempt to justify saving oneself at the expense of others to be acceptable by any of our friends across the seas. If we accept this reasoning and voluntarily follow this course, I believe that, for the foreseeable future, we will be regarded by civilized people as unworthy of trust and confidence.

I am quite willing to concede that something needed to be done to awaken the Europeans to the deadly peril of their position and to induce them to bear their full share of the burden of rearming. If the speeches advocating withdrawal into our shell had this objective in mind, they may have had some merit, but, as an expression of sound policy for us to follow, I cannot agree with them.

The argument is also made that Europe has lost the will to resist and, therefore, it is useless to try to assist her. It is an insidious argument, and I believe it is unsound and misleading. Europeans may well be confused, as we are, and they may be hesitant to assume a belligerant attitude toward Russia—at least until some progress is made toward developing a respectable army. I do not believe that basically the people of Western Europe have lost their spirit of independence or their desire to remain freemen. The fact is that few people realize how much the Europeans have already done in increasing their industrial production and in putting their house in order so that they can support increased armed forces. General Eisenhower will advise us about this aspect of the matter upon his return, but I am confident that the situation is not nearly as hopeless as some would lead us to believe. On Monday the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] presented to the Senate facts showing a very substantial war effort by the countries of Western Europe.

The Europeans need assurance, not that we will furnish all, or even a major fraction, of the ground troops for their defense, but assurance that the shifting political scene in our own country will not expose them to sudden death in a futile undertaking. In other words, they want to feel that we are in this struggle with them, that we will not repudiate our Atlantic Treaty obligations nor by legalistic interpretation nullify the treaty's meaning. I quite agree that our troops should not be exposed to danger in Europe unless and until the Europeans give convincing evidence that they are willing to go the limit in their own defense. This is very different, however, from Mr. Hoover's idea that a "sure dam" against Russian aggression must first be built by the Europeans alone. We must not jockey about, each waiting on the other to take the first step. We should proceed simultaneously, in good faith, to do what needs to be done.

When influential public men like the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] insist that we should not assume the leadership or the initiative in organizing the defenses of Europe, in effect they are saying there can be no leadership of the western allies. Whether we like it or not, ours is the only country with the prestige and power necessary to organize and lead the free peoples in opposition to the Kremlin. To refuse to accept the leadership and to provide the initiative, when it is obvious that we alone among the free peoples have the power to provide both, seems to me to be tantamount to ultimate surrender. I believe the most powerful influence toward fatalistic defeatism in free Europe is the doubt they entertain about our willingness to lead them vigorously and confidently in this struggle. We and the Europeans possess sufficient resources and manpower to restrain or, if we must, to defeat the Russians, but as yet we have neither unity of purpose nor strong leadership. The masters of the Kremlin lead their slave world in no uncertain manner. Unless we can do likewise for the free world, a return to the Dark Ages is no idle fantasy.

To sum up this phase of our discussion, I believe we should plan to help defend Western Europe from Russian invasion as best we can in accordance with our obligations under the Atlantic Treaty. The broad question of policy, as to whether or not the best interests of this country require that we help Europe defend itself with troops as well as guns, is properly a question for Congress to decide. But the question of the precise number of men and machines needed to achieve the objective should be left to the judgment of our military leaders. Such decisions are inherently executive in character. With regard to other critical strategic areas such as Turkey and Greece and Japan, we should, within the limit of our available resources, give assistance to their efforts to resist Russian aggression. In these areas the need is for materials rather than manpower, and, if we can possibly spare the weapons, these areas should be assisted. The Turks in particular have demonstrated in Korea a superb courage and fighting spirit. They should be helped.

As to China, frankly I do not see how we can do anything effective, other than the encouragement of guerrilla warfare and sabotage of a clandestine nature. The basic situation in China was, and is, I believe, quite different from that in Europe. Even before the First World War China was experiencing a revolution inspired by the desire of the people to throw off the shackles of a decadent, feudalistic social and political order. Unfortunately for us, the Kremlin, quick to recognize the possibilities of the situation, stepped in and took charge of the revolt against the old order.

The impulse of the Chinese masses to revolt against the exploitation and oppression and chaos following the breakup of the old imperial Manchu dynasty probably could have been directed along democratic lines had we understood clearly what was going on. However, the fact is that the Communists, directed by Moscow, did move in and usurp the control of the revolutionary movement. Instead of freedom and self-government, China now has a stern dictator subject to the domination of Moscow. It is a major tragedy. Nevertheless I am unable to see what we can do about it at this late date other than as I have indicated.

It is my view that the safest and wisest policy for us to follow is neither the Hoover-Kennedy-Taft policy nor the Truman policy. The former is dangerous to our security and is morally wrong. The latter is beyond our capacity to carry out. I firmly believe, however, that by limiting our commitments to Europe and certain additional strategic areas as I have indicated, we can bring about the unity of the free world and with wisdom lay the foundation for a lasting peace founded upon freedom and justice.

It is high time that some of our public men—and I do not exclude Senators—stop wringing their hands, stop searching for scapegoats, stop bemoaning our fate, and stop condemning our allies. What a spectacle we must be to little Finland, or Turkey, or Sweden, calm and determined as they are, and yet confronted at their very doors by the Russian bear. We are a great Nation, a rich, powerful, productive people capable of accomplishments beyond our imagination. We should not act like spoiled, hysterical children just because we have suffered a temporary though bitter defeat. I say "temporary" because our people still have a deep respect for and faith in the Christian virtues which made this country great and which will pull us through this crisis. They are hard-working, honest, tolerant human beings, and above all, our people still have personal freedom.

Freedom of the individual is our nonsecret weapon which in the long run will out-produce and out-maneuver the serfs of the Kremlin. The imagination, the initiative, the ingenuity of genuinely free people have no limits. When necessity prods and the leaders wisely direct them, free people will always prevail over slaves.

THE KOREAN CEASE-FIRE PROPOSAL

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks a news dispatch taken from the ticker in the cloakroom. It deals with the latest proposal made by the Chinese Communist regime. I wish to point out that on the face of it under the proposed cease-fire agreement, which would set up a 7-nation conference, four of the nations mentioned have already expressed themselves as favoring the seating of the Chinese Communist regime in the United Nations, and have already expressed their willingness to barter Formosa to the Chinese Communists. Therefore I believe that in that respect the latest proposal has not changed the situation in any regard.

In the past I have been critical of the State Department when I felt criticism of it was justified. At this time I wish to commend the recent statement of Mr. Gross, which very clearly indicated that the United States would not barter Formosa, and that no discussions would be had in relation to Formosa without the participation of the Government of the Republic of China in such discussions.

Mr. President, based on press dispatches which have been received today it seems to me that the latest maneuver on the part of the Government of India in calling for another 48-hour delay is purely an obstructive tactic. In the final analysis, what the UN must do, if it is not to lose the confidence of the people of the world, is clearly and frankly to brand Communist China as the aggressor that she is. If the United Nations fails to do so, it will lose the right to the moral support of the people of the world. Failure to designate Communist China as an aggressor will in fact be saying that a small aggressor is an aggressor, but a large aggressor is not an aggressor, and that, frankly stated, the doctrine of might makes right. I do not believe that the United Nations can continue to enjoy the confidence of the people of the world if it fails to face up to that issue.

There being no objection, the press dispatch was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Sir Benegal Rau told the UN that Communist China has agreed to a cease-fire in Korea for a limited-time period that would be established at the start of a proposed seven-nation conference on far-eastern problems.

Rau told the General Assembly's main political committee that the Chinese Communist Government had given such assurance to Sardar Pannikar, the Indian Ambassador in Peking, in reply to a request for clarification of the Peking regime's position as outlined in an earlier statement rejecting a UN peace program.

The Chinese Communists, however, insist that the seven-nation conference—to include the Peking Government, the United States, Russia, Britain, France, India, and Egypt—must discuss the withdrawal of American forces from Formosa and the ousting of Nationalist China from the UN in favor of Mao Tze-tung's regime.

Ambassador Ernest A. Gross, deputy chief of the United States delegation to the UN, declared in a statement last night that this country would not agree to discuss the future of Formosa unless the Chinese Nationalists were represented, and said the question must be "handled in a way completely consistent with our national interests and security."

Rau's announcement led immediately to suggestions that the political committee adjourn to study it. Rau himself suggested a 48-hour adjournment and Antonio Quevedo, of Ecuador, supported the proposal.

Rau told the committee that the Indian Ambassador had submitted certain points on which doubts were entertained in various quarters to the Chinese Communist Foreign Office and received the following reply:

"1. If the principle that all foreign troops should be withdrawn from Korea has been accepted and put into practice, the Chinese People's Government assume the responsibility to advise its volunteers to return to China.

"2. Regarding the conclusion of the war in Korea and a peaceful settlement of the Korean problems, we think we can proceed in two steps:

"The first step: A cease-fire for a limited-time period can be agreed upon at the first meeting of the seven-nation conference and put into effect so that negotiations may proceed further.

"The second step: In order that the war in Korea may be concluded completely and peace in Asia be assured, all conditions for the conclusion of the war must be discussed in connection with political problems in order that there may be agreement on the following:

"A. Steps and measures for the withdrawal of all foreign troops.

"B. Proposals to the Korean people for settling internal affairs by the Korean people.

"C. Withdrawal of United States forces from Formosa and the Straits of Formosa in accordance with the Cairo and Potsdam declarations.

"D. Other problems of the Far East.

"3. A definite affirmation of the legitimate status of the Chinese People's Republic in the UN must be insured."

Informed sources said the questions submitted by Pannikar to the Peking government originated with Canadian Premier Louis St. Laurent who communicated them to Indian Prime Minister Jawharlal Nehru, who relayed them, in turn, to his ambassador.

Opposition to the Chinese plan, as relayed by India, was immediately voiced by Alexis Kyrou, of Greece, who said UN prestige would suffer by submitting to the counterplan put forward by the Chinese Communists in reply to the world organization's five-point offer of peace.

The new communication marked the first time that Communist China has retreated from its adamant demand for negotiations first and cease fire afterward. The Chinese appeared also to have backed down from their demand for immediate seating in the UN as a prelude to peace.

POWER OF THE PRESIDENT TO SEND TROOPS ABROAD WITHOUT SPECIFIC AUTHORIZATION BY CONGRESS

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, in my remarks on the pending question I shall make extensive use of numerous reference works, and I ask unanimous consent that citations to such reference works be printed in the RECORD in the form of footnotes. I feel that because of the lateness of the hour I should not take the time of the Senate to read the footnotes into the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that certain extracts from the Constitution of the United States be set forth in the RECORD at the close of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, there are two great issues before the Nation and the Congress at this moment. They are distinct issues, but somehow they appear to be blurred in the public mind. That confusion is also reflected in some of the recent Senate debate.

The first issue goes to the policy determination on the nature and scope of our participation in European defense.

The second issue goes solely to the question of authority for that ultimate decision, and the relative responsibilities of the Executive and the Congress in making it.

The pending resolution is related to the second issue alone.

As such, the pending resolution seriously raises the question of the President's power to send troops abroad without specific authorization from Congress in circumstances short of a declaration of war.

It is to this question that I wish to address myself by reference to some of the historical and legal precedents on the subject.

Conflicting concepts of executive power have struggled for dominance in American governmental practice and theory since 1789. According to the one concept, the legislative power was and should remain supreme, with the executive power subordinate. Another viewpoint conceives of the Presidency as cloaked with the prerogatives of sovereignty and presidential powers as almost autonomous and self-directing. Under yet another theory the legislative and executive—along with the judicial—powers are coordinate and supposed to be in balance.

The discussion to follow does not deal with the issue between the President and Congress with regard to the making of treaties or executive agreements. This would require a lengthy study by itself.

Whatever the merits of these basic concepts, taken by and large, the history of the Presidency, as one modern authority phrases it, has been "a history of aggrandizement."[1] While the growth of the powers of the President was evidenced throughout the nineteenth century, this increase in power was greatly accelerated in the twentieth century. With the replacement of the laissez faire theory of Government and the active participation of the United States in international politics the executive department has expanded greatly in size and influence.

In the field of foreign relations, in particular, the increase of Presidential power has become obvious. In 1936 this increase was upheld by the Supreme Court in the case of the United States against Curtiss-Wright Export Corp. At that time the Court stated that the President's power in the field of international relations was "plenary and exclusive" and did not require the sanction of Congress. Since 1936 the President has acted in a number of occasions—most notably in the case of the destroyer deal in 1940—in clear violation of statutory law, if not in violation of the Constitution as well, but the Court has had no occasion to expand or modify the 1936 decision.

It is questionable, however, whether the power of the President in the role of Commander in Chief has grown to the same extent as his power in the field of diplomacy. Although Presidents have frequently taken action as Commander in Chief, asserting the title "to eke out a paucity of statutory authority," it is generally recognized that being Commander in Chief is one of the incidents inseparable from the office of President.[2] It is useful, nevertheless, to discuss the power of the President as Commander in Chief as a separate category particularly in regard to the employment of the Armed Forces where Congress, under the Constitution, has also been given powers and more specific powers than those of the President. Despite the number of occasions on which the President has sent American forces overseas without a declaration of war or other specific congressional authority, the Supreme Court has never ruled as to the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of any of such actions. In the face of charges of usurpation of power made by Congressmen and constitutional authorities when the President has so acted, the legality of such acts in time of peace remains open to question.

I. THE INTENTIONS OF THE FOUNDING FATHERS

One of the major struggles in the evolution of both modern and ancient democracy has been to popularize control of the decision on war or peace and to restrict the freedom of the head of the nation to use the armed forces at his discretion. For centuries kings, at whim, sent armies to fight in foreign lands where thousands of voiceless subjects paid the price of their lives. Memories of these evils left strong fears in the minds of western democratic and constitutional thinkers in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The American colonists inherited these fears, strengthened by forced participation in colonial wars which were the result of decisions over which the colonists had no control. The colonists also feared the very existence of a large army and navy as a temptation to engage in international conflicts. As one student of the Constitution has said:

> Judging by the hot debates that occurred over the popular ratification of the Constitution, nothing was more feared by the American people at the time than a standing army.[3]

It was with these traditional fears that the founding fathers set out in framing the Constitution to control the power to involve the new Nation in war. It was to Congress that the Constitution specifically entrusted not only the sole power to declare war, but also the authority to "provide for the common defense," to "raise and support armies," and to "make rules for the Government and regulation of the land and naval forces." It limited appropriations of money to raise and support armies to a term of 2 years, so that Congress would have to review the use of such money at least that frequently.

As Thomas Jefferson commented on these decisions of the founding fathers, the Constitution had "muzzled the dog of war" by transferring the power of "letting him loose from the executive to the legislative body, from those who are to spend to those who are to pay." Some decades later, Senator Charles Sumner pointed out on the floor of Congress the significance of the decision of the Constitutional Convention in regard to the question of war and peace:

> This is a peculiar principle of our Government by which it is distinguished from monarchical governments, where power to declare war, and also the treaty-making power, is in the Executive alone.[4]

The makers of the Constitution recognized that the President must have the power to use the Armed Forces to repel a sudden attack without a declaration of war by Congress. In the days when it took weeks for Congress to be called and assembled such a contingency had to be met by Presidential action. There were, however, obvious limitations on the President's power to use the Armed Forces. Every 2 years, at least, the President was at the mercy of Congress for a new appropriation for the Army. The makers of the Constitution also thought of the standing army as a relatively small volunteer force since standing armies were at best a necessary evil.[5] They placed major reliance upon the militia which each State was to provide and to train.[6] But Congress could call for the militia and the Commander in Chief could use the militia only in three contingencies: First, in case of an insurrection against the Federal authority; second, in case a State, threatened by internal disorder, called for aid; and, third, in case of invasion by a foreign foe.

When in 1812 it was suggested that the militia be used for the invasion and occupation of Canada, Congress rejected the idea as unconstitutional. Congressional action in 1846, giving President Polk authority to employ militia against Mexican forces in what was expected to be a foreign war, has been generally regarded as unconstitutional.[7] It was not until the Spanish-American War when the President planned the dispatch of militia to Cuba that the constitutional limitation was circumvented by mustering all militia out of the service of their respective States and into that of the United States. And it was not until the Selective Service Act of 1917 that Congress authorized the draft of men for service abroad. Since this action broke with an Anglo-American legal tradition which had remained intact since the latter half of the fourteenth century, charges of unconstitutionality were brought before the Supreme Court.[8] The Court, however, unanimously upheld the Selective Service Act.

The Constitutional Convention not only gave thought to the contingencies in which the President could employ a conscript army but held some fear over the President's role as Commander in Chief. A desire was expressed by one delegate to prevent the President from assuming personal command of the troops, but no action was taken. An example of the fear of Presidential misuse of the army is also found in the New York State convention called to ratify the Constitution where there was a debate over an amendment to forbid the President to command the army without special consent of Congress. Even such a strong proponent of the executive power as Alexander Hamilton wrote in Federalist 69 that the President's power as Commander in Chief was "in substance much inferior" to that of the King of England and would amount to "nothing more than the supreme command and direction of the military and naval forces, as first general and admiral of the Confederacy." This appears to mean that the President was to be top general and top admiral but to have no powers other than those of any high military or naval commander.[9] This view was reinforced by an outstanding nineteenth century student of the American Constitution who believed that the President was "simply Commander in Chief and not at all the lord of peace and war."[10]

II. STATEMENTS BY PRESIDENTS ON THE WAR-MAKING POWER

Although the President, by the nature of his position is given often to the broadest interpretation of the powers of the Presidency, many Presidents have publicly recognized the supremacy of the legislative power in situations involving the use of military force in such a way as to threaten war. John Adams, confronted by a series of depredations against American ships on the high seas, sent a message to Congress on May 16, 1797, in which he said:

> It remains for Congress to prescribe such regulations as will enable our seafaring citizens to defend themselves against violations of the law of nations and at the same time restrain them from committing acts of hostility against the powers at war.[11]

Before assuming the Presidency himself, Thomas Jefferson viewed even a Presidential declaration of neutrality as unconstitutional. Referring to the action of Washington, Jefferson said that it was "a declaration there should be no war, to which the Executive was not competent."[12] In his first annual message to Congress as President, Jefferson reported an American naval attack on a marauding Tripolitan cruiser which was bent on raiding American shipping in the Mediterranean:

> Unauthorized by the Constitution, without the sanction of Congress, to go beyond the line of defense, the [Tripolitan] vessel, being disabled from committing further hostilities, was liberated with its crew. The legislature will doubtlessly consider whether, by authorizing measures of offense also, they will place our forces on equal footing with that of its adversaries.[13]

Even President Jackson, who so vigorously advanced the powers of the Presidency, took occasion to refer the question of Texas to Congress as one "probably leading to war" and therefore a proper subject for "a previous understanding with that body by whom war can alone be declared and by whom all the provisions for sustaining its perils must be furnished."[14] Again in 1831 after ordering an armed vessel to the South Atlantic to protect American shipping against raiders from Buenos Aires, Jackson went to Congress.

> I submit the case to the consideration of Congress, to the end that they may clothe the Executive with such authority and means as they deem necessary for providing a force adequate to the complete protection of our fellow citizens fishing and trading in these seas.[15]

President Buchanan was also clear in his recognition of the constitutional authority of Congress in the use of armed force for an offensive purpose outside the territory of the United States.

The first occasion was in his annual message of December 8, 1857, when he asked Congress to implement the treaty with Colombia by which the United States guaranteed the neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama.

> Under these circumstances I recommend to Congress the passage of an act authorizing the President, in case of necessity, to employ the land and naval forces of the United States to carry into effect this guaranty of neutrality and protection.

On December 6, 1858, Buchanan went further to say:

> The Executive Government of this country in its intercourse with foreign nations is limited to the employment of diplomacy alone.

I repeat "is limited to the employment of diplomacy alone."

When this fails it can proceed no further. It cannot legitimately resort to force without the direct authority of Congress, except in resisting and repelling hostile attacks.

Buchanan was also careful to disavow Presidential power to act in the shadowland area between open war and peace.

> It will not be denied that the general "power to declare war" is without limitation and embraces within itself not only what writers on the law of nations term a public or perfect war, but also an imperfect war, and, in short, every species of hostility, however confined or limited. Without the authority of Congress the President cannot fire a hostile gun in any case except to repel the attacks of an enemy.[16]

He said:

> Without the authority of Congress the President cannot fire a hostile gun in any case except to repel the attacks of an enemy.

Although Abraham Lincoln as President was responsible for the greatest expansion to that date in the powers of the Presidency by wedding the role of Commander in Chief with the clause that makes it the duty of the President to see that "the laws be faithfully executed," he was also clear in his understanding of the intent of the makers of the Constitution. In a letter written in February 1848 he said:

> Kings had always been involving and impoverishing their people in wars, pretend[ing] generally, if not always, that the good of the people was the object. This our [Constitutional] Convention understood to be the most oppressive of all kingly oppressions, and they resolved to so frame the Constitution that no one man should hold the power of bringing this oppression upon us.

But in the first decade of the twentieth century President Theodore Roosevelt set a number of radical precedents by his action in Panama and the Caribbean, using American forces in an offensive capacity without seeking authorization from Congress. It remained for Woodrow Wilson, both a believer in a strong Executive and a student of the Constitution, again to appear before Congress for authorization to use American forces outside the country.

On April 20, 1914, after a serious clash of authority between American and Mexican forces in the port of Tampico, Wilson sent a message to a joint session of Congress which is of particular significance since it presents Wilson's view as a student of the Constitution in its opening sentences and his belief in Executive supremacy in its closing. Wilson opened his request by saying:

> It is my duty—

I underscore and emphasize the words, "It is my duty"— > to call your attention to a situation * * * which calls for action and to ask your advice and cooperation in acting upon it. * * * I have come to ask your approval and support in the course I now propose to pursue.[17]

After explaining the situation, Wilson went on to say:

> No doubt I could do what is necessary in the circumstances to enforce respect for our Government without recourse to the Congress and yet not exceed my constitutional powers as President, but I do not wish to act in a matter of so grave consequence except in close conference and cooperation with both Senate and House. I therefore come to ask your approval that I should use the Armed Forces of the United States in such ways and to such an extent as may be necessary to obtain * * * the fullest recognition of the rights and dignity of the United States.

The House on the same day of the President's message voted him the authority to use troops by 337 to 37, with 56 Members not voting. The Senate referred the resolution to committee and debated it on the 21st of April. It was on that day that an army of 6,000 men were landed in Mexico, capturing Veracruz and holding possession of that city for 7 months. The Senate debated the resolution until early on the morning of the 22d when it was passed by a vote of 72 to 13 before news of the military action reached Washington.

In March 1916 the executive department again sought authority from Congress to use troops, this time to cross the Mexican border in pursuit of Pancho Villa who had been raiding American border towns. Congress was given to understand that full agreement had been reached with Mexico for the border crossing and on March 17 a concurrent resolution was passed approving the use of the Armed Forces "for the sole purpose of apprehending and punishing. . . ."

III. DECISIONS OF THE COURTS

Court decisions on the powers of the President in the use of the Armed Forces without a declaration of war have been almost completely lacking. Recognition has been given to two instances where the President can employ troops without a declaration of war—rebellion and invasion—but actions taken outside of those categories have not been subject to judicial review. In 1853 American naval forces bombarded the port of San Juan del Norte on the coast of Nicaragua in default of reparation which the naval commander had demanded for a mob attack on the United States consul.

President Pierce in his annual message to Congress defended the action as necessary to protect the lives and property of American citizens from future attacks. Some years later the American officer in charge of the bombardment was sued in a lower Federal court for the value of some property destroyed in the course of the naval action. Justice Nelson in his decision said:

> As respects the interposition of the Executive abroad for the protection of the lives or property of the citizen, the duty must, of necessity, rest in the discretion of the President.[18]

But in 1863 the Supreme Court in the Prize cases reaffirmed the supremacy of the legislative power in war-making. The President, said the Court, has "no power to initiate or declare a war." Yet as late as 1945, a former Assistant Secretary of State, after studying the decisions of the courts, said:

> The final authority on constitutional law has not yet spoken on the use of the Army and Navy for violence abroad in times of nominal peace.[19]

IV. PRESIDENTIAL PRACTICE

It is customary for the proponents of wide Executive power to cite the numerous cases in which the armed forces of the United States have been used abroad without declarations of war and often without any congressional sanction other than that given indirectly through the appropriation of funds for the Armed Forces. A number of compilations have been made of the landing of American forces on foreign soil which range upwards from a hundred or more cases.[20]

Most of these incidents, however, were efforts to protect definite rights of persons and property against impending violence, and were claimed not to be acts of war. Many of them took place in the Caribbean, and can be considered as special cases because of the Monroe Doctrine. But these actions are discredited today with the commitments of the United States to treat the Monroe Doctrine as a multilateral declaration, rather than a unilateral justification for political intervention.

More significant are the recent actions of President Franklin Roosevelt in the period prior to Pearl Harbor. While claiming the immunities of a neutral in time of war, troops were sent not only to bases in the Western Hemisphere leased from one of the belligerents, but also to advanced posts such as Iceland, while American naval vessels were convoying materials of war to one of the belligerents in a war zone and unofficially were attacking the submarine forces of the other belligerent—all without prior consultation or authorization from Congress.

Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan was one of the members of the select committee which held hearings in regard to the attack on Pearl Harbor. The evidence showed clearly that at one time the President of the United States had in contemplation—and had prepared plans accordingly—the sending of an American force to an island in the Atlantic, which it was expected would be taken over from Portugal. There is nothing in that particular record to show that the President contemplated doing that without obtaining the consent of the Congress. Therefore that incident cannot be cited as one involving a belief on the part of the President of the United States that he had authority to send a United States armed force to foreign soil without obtaining the consent of Congress.

If none of these actions has been challenged in the Supreme Court—as appears to be the case—it is largely because the issue was a public one and not in form suitable for judicial determination. Such grave questions as the ones we are now discussing hardly constitute the subject matter of cases which could be taken to the Supreme Court, for under the circumstances there would be no way by which a man serving in the Armed Forces could obtain a hearing of such a question in a lower court. By the time he was sent abroad, for service in the Armed Forces, he would not even be able to use our courts, to get a writ of habeas corpus. I mention that point because some persons will wonder why these matters have not been reviewed by the courts. They involve grave public questions which nevertheless are simply not suitable for judicial determination by the courts.

There is no question, however, that such an interpretation of the powers of the Presidency conflicts not only with the intent of the makers of the Constitution but also with most of the precedents and interpretations of the past.

The authority for such actions has been challenged from time to time by eminent Members of the Congress and by outstanding publicists. However, we find that on repeated occasions the issue has been foreclosed when the President confronted the Congress with the facts of the action taken, which, however unauthorized, left Congress with no alternative but to accept it.

At the same time when President Roosevelt was taking unilateral action, he did seek to find a legal basis for some of his actions—such as the opinion of Attorney General Jackson on June 5, 1940, in regard to the sale of arms to Britain as "surplus," and the Attorney General's opinion in September of the same year in regard to the legality of the transfer of American destroyers to Britain.

In 1942 the President made an interesting exception to his previous assumptions about Presidential power over the use of American troops, in appealing to Congress for authority to send military missions to friendly nations. The executive branch asked Congress to amend the act of May 19, 1926, and the act of May 14, 1935, which had given the President authority to detail military and naval missions at his discretion to assist governments of Latin American countries and the Government of the Philippines. The amendment requested gave the President authority "during war or a declared national emergency" to detail missions to other countries as he deemed it in the national interest. Congress so authorized the President by an act of October 1, 1942.

The military mission authorization not only involved the congressional power over the military forces, but also the need for congressional authorization for an officer of the United States to accept any remuneration or office from a foreign government, under article I, section 9, of the Constitution.

Recently, Mr. President, when it was suggested by the Chinese Nationalist Government on Formosa that they could use certain American officers in connection with the training of their troops and in the preparation of their men for the use of arms which they had obtained from the United States, the President of the United States and the executive branch of the Government gave as one of the reasons why that could not be done, that it was not authorized, and could not be done because of the act of Congress which made it illegal for an officer of the United States to accept any remuneration from a foreign government. Mr. President, if that law was constitutional and if it was recognized as the law of the land, it was because of the legislative authority to make that law; and if it was legal then, it is legal all the time. The President cannot use the law in one way, as a political weapon, on one occasion, and on a subsequent occasion use it in an opposite way. Certainly the President should abide by the law on all occasions.

In the Seventy-ninth and Eightieth Congresses, President Truman unsuccessfully renewed a request for authority to dispatch missions to any countries in time of peace. Although the bill was amended in the Eightieth Congress so as to exclude any possible authorization of combat troops, it died in the Senate committee to which it was referred.

V. CONCLUSIONS

On these precedents, historical and judicial, the question of constitutionality as it relates to the power of the President to send American forces overseas, without a declaration of war or other congressional authorization, must remain open in 1951.

Opinions of constitutional authorities fall on either side.

There can be no question, however, of the original intent of the Constitution, regardless of contemporary interpretations of that document.

The makers of the Constitution did not conceive of the President's powers as Commander in Chief to be unlimited.

They did not contemplate the use of conscript forces outside the territory of the United States.

They clearly intended that the dangers of an irresponsible sovereign were to be avoided in the United States. To that end they concentrated the power to raise, finance, and govern the Armed Forces as well as the power to declare war in the hands of Congress.

A long line of distinguished Presidents, reaching down into the twentieth century, thought these decisions wise and abided by them.

And despite the tremendous growth in the power of the Presidency, the employment of American forces under the sole authority of the Commander in Chief in such a way as to create a threat of war must still be looked upon as a deviation from the main stream of American Presidential and constitutional tradition.

Mr. President, what I have discussed thus far deals mainly with the legal and historical relations between the President and Congress.

It does not touch upon or dispose of the policy question. Statecraft operates more in the area of conscience than in strict legality. Even if it were constitutional, legal, and proper for the President to assert a personal power against the Congress, he ought not do it in a matter involving the lives and fortunes of all our people. That is what hangs in the balance in the present proposal to implement the Atlantic Pact.

In the House there has been placed a series of plaques depicting the long line of great statesmen and jurists. One of these presents Edward I, King of England, in whose reign the people of England gained important rights over their sovereign.

The parliamentary constitution of England was established as the result of Edward's convocation of the model Parliament of 1295. In his writ of summons, Edward incorporated these words:

What touches all should be approved by all, and it is also clear that common dangers should be met by measures agreed upon in common.

Mr. President, this is wise policy and marks a tremendous forward step in the development of representative government. It is no less applicable to our problem today.

The idea of sending American troops overseas as something of a permanent garrison in Europe is new in American history. It is a tremendous decision to make. It should not be made as the result of a dispute on powers between the President and Congress. It should be made by the President and Congress working in the closest teamwork. In no other way can the confidence, strength, and support of the people be mobilized in these times when the spirit of a nation is the essential breath of life to a nation's foreign policy, and even its survival.

The following are provisions of the Constitution containing specific delegations of power to the Congress and to the President, respectively, which bear on the question of the authority to use troops abroad.

Article I, section 8, states:

"The Congress shall have power to * * * provide for the common defense * * *; to declare war * * *; to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than 2 years; to provide and maintain a navy; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces; to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions; to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress; * * * [to provide] for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings."

Article II, section 2, states:

"The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States."

RECESS

Mr. HOLLAND. I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, January 23, 1951, at 12 o'clock meridian.

MONDAY, JANUARY 22, 1951

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Holy Spirit of the Eternal God, may this moment of prayer be one of reverence and sincerity, of gladness and gratitude, of humility and penitence, as we unburden our souls to Thy listening ear and understanding heart.

Thou knowest that daily we need the blessings of insight and inspiration, of hope and courage, which Thou alone canst give. Fill our minds with wisdom, our hearts with love, and our hands with usefulness.

Grant that for our war-torn and divided world we may discover those unities which underlie all diversities.

Enable us by Thy grace to have a clearer vision and a more vivid sense of the high and helpful things which we may do together in the building of a nobler civilization.

We pray that, above all, our spirits may be brought into harmony with Thy spirit and may we walk in Thy counsel and may we delight ourselves in the law of the Lord.

In Christ's name we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 19, 1951, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Woodruff, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had—Ordered, That the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON] be appointed a member of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report vice former Senator Francis J. Myers, of Pennsylvania.

Ordered, That the Senator from New Mexico, Mr. ANDERSON, be appointed a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy vice former Senator Millard E. Tydings, of Maryland.

The message also announced that the Vice President has appointed Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina and Mr. LANGER members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of August 5, 1939, entitled "An act to provide for the disposition of certain records of the United States Government," for the disposition of executive papers referred to in the report of the Archivist of the United States numbered 51–12.

The message also announced that the Vice President has appointed Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina and Mr. LANGER members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of August 5, 1939, entitled "An act to provide for the disposition of certain records of the United States Government," for the disposition of executive papers referred to in the report of the Archivist of the United States numbered 51–11.

RESOLUTION BRANDING COMMUNIST CHINA AN AGGRESSOR IN KOREA

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, last Friday the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], aided and abetted by another gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], rammed through the House a resolution which called on the United Nations to brand Communist China an aggressor in Korea.

Those who initiated this action, without previous notice and when only a handful of Members were on the floor, claimed action on Friday was urgent although they never adequately explained why.

The RECORD shows that the other body of Congress found no reason for stampeding its Members into such action, and neither did the UN.

I am sure every Member of Congress agrees that Communist China is an aggressor in Korea, but I am still protesting emphatically against the twentieth century Tower of Babel, known as the United Nations, using the House of Representatives as a tool.

Let the House speak out, in all matters, with its own voice and in its own right. And let it be called upon to speak when all Members have been properly and decently notified.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. CRAWFORD asked and was given permission to address the House for 30 minutes on Thursday next, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

REPORT OF HON. LEON H. GAVIN, OF PENNSYLVANIA, HOUSE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, during the period November 18–December 16, 1950, I visited occupied areas in Germany and Austria, and other countries in Europe, pursuant to the request of the chairman of this committee and invitational orders issued by the Department of the Army. While the time spent in each country was necessarily brief, every effort was made to confer with responsible officials, both American and foreign, and to observe, at first hand, the general circumstances, conditions, and attitudes prevalent in the areas visited. I could also, as the result of prior visits made to Europe during the past 3 years, gauge current conditions somewhat more accurately than would otherwise have been possible. While the principal purpose of my trip was, of course, the inspection of military installations and units in the European theater, and the evaluation of efforts being made by our allied powers in the North Atlantic Pact, an effort was also made to determine, within the limited time available, the general economic situation prevailing in the several countries. It is my hope that the following comments and observations may be of some value to the committee during the present session of the Eighty-second Congress, and may also be of general assistance to individual members of the committee, particularly those whose schedules and engagements during the past 2 years have not permitted visits to Europe.

On November 18, the undersigned visited Westover Air Force Base, Mass., and Lagens, Azores. At the former station there has been some slight amount of construction, including some housing built under the provisions of the Wherry Act—Public Law 211, Eighty-first Congress—as amended. However, the main portion of this large station, which serves as the principal Atlantic base, or terminal for the Military Air Transport Service, is of temporary frame construction. Most of the buildings were erected some 8 years ago, and have already outlasted their designed life. While it is probably not feasible during the current national emergency to replace these structures with permanent buildings, the attention of the committee is invited to two considerations: First, the continued use of temporary frame structures involves high costs for heating and maintenance; second, if the Department of Defense is to continue utilizing this base, some start should be made on a permanent building program as soon as conditions will permit.

The situation with respect to the facilities at Lagens, Azores, is even less satisfactory. There is still little or no permanent construction at this base, which must serve a major portion of our trans-Atlantic military aircraft. I do not know the reasons for the protracted delay in modernizing and improving this base; but I am convinced that such improvement should be commenced at the earliest practicable date.

The situation at Harmon Air Force Base, Newfoundland, is likewise unsatisfactory, with regard to facilities. A major construction program for this base was included in the authorization legislation enacted by the Congress and funds were provided in appropriation bills; but due to the economy campaign instituted by a former Secretary of Defense in 1949–50, the program was drastically curtailed. I personally inspected the base hospital consisting of a group of ramshackle tar-paper shacks and can assure the committee that replacement is needed at a very early date. While this is only one example, I am convinced that adequate facilities must be provided shortly—even though the cost now will probably be more than double what it would have been under the original contract.

I. WESTERN GERMANY

During the period November 19–24, the undersigned was in the northern portion of the United States zone of Germany, principally Frankfurt, Heidelberg, and Wiesbaden. At Frankfurt, I conferred with Mr. John J. McCloy, United State High Commissioner for Germany, and certain of his staff advisers, particularly Mr. Horace Gilbert, economic consultant on leave of absence from the faculty of the California Institute of Technology. In Heidelberg, I conferred with the commanding general, United States forces in Europe, Gen. Thomas T. Handy, and members of his staff, particularly Major General Noce. In Wiesbaden I had the opportunity of conferring with Lieutenant General Cannon, Chief of the United States Air Forces in Europe, and Major General Douglass and Brig. Gen. Millard Lewis of his staff. I was also, during this period, able to travel about this portion of the United States zone, and make certain observations, which are summarized below:

(a) Economic: The signs of economic recovery are everywhere apparent in the United States zone of Germany. Substantial progress has been made not only in cleaning up rubble and removing damaged buildings, but in replacing commercial structures and restoring public utility and transport systems. While the standard of living is lower than in the United States, it compares favorably with most of Europe, and is in heartening contrast with the desperate conditions which prevailed in 1946–47. Since the reformation of the currency in Western Germany, there has been a steady improvement in trade and industry. Stores at present are amply stocked with food and merchandise of all kinds, and there is no rationing. The prices, while generally reasonable by United States standards, are often high compared to the wages and income of German consumers. However, most of the people appeared well clothed, adequately fed, and well shod. The chief economic problem in Western Germany today is unemployment, which stems from two unfortunate decisions or policies adopted during the last stages of World War II. The first of these was the agreement for the expulsion of German ethnic groups from Poland and Czechoslovakia. Millions of these people, whose properties were expropriated by the Communist regimes of the two countries mentioned, have been dumped on Western Germany, a region already heavily populated. Aggravating this condition was the deindustrialization policy, particularly the dismantling of factories and industrial plants capable of producing civilian goods. The folly of this latter program, and the harmful effects resulting therefrom have already been pointed out to the Congress, and it is understood that the program has been substantially terminated in the United States zone. However, the British Government in whose zone major steel and metallurgical industries are located, has continued the program for a much longer period. It is understandable that the British should fear the competition of a revived German industry; but it makes very little sense for the United States to seek the improvement of economic conditions in Germany by ECA loans and grants, while the British Government adheres to a program of dismantling and destroying industrial plants.

(b) Military: As far as the general military picture in Germany is concerned, the situation remains basically unchanged from a year ago. There is no substantial defense in Western Germany able to meet a major Russian offensive. It is reliably estimated that at any time the Russians could commit over 25 of their own divisions which are now west of their borders and able to move at will. This is exclusive of the troops raised and maintained by the satellite regimes of Poland, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia. In addition, since the close of hostilities against Germany the Russians have augmented the air strength in their zone of Germany and are estimated to have over 2,000 combat aircraft in Germany alone. This figure has, of course, only limited significance, because they could also move an overwhelming number of additional aircraft into that the theater if they desired.

To counter this force, the Western Powers have in Germany only the equivalent of about seven divisions. The strength of the United States forces in Germany has not changed greatly during the past year. So far as can be judged, the United States Army and Air Force personnel are more efficiently employed, better trained, and have a higher combat effectiveness than at any time since the end of World War II. The suspension of normal rotation to and from Europe has resulted in more experienced personnel. Combat forces have been increasingly relieved of occupation or "housekeeping" duties, and greater emphasis has been placed upon training, including more field maneuvers. I am convinced that our forces in Germany are well led, and that, if necessity arose, the responsible commanders would achieve the utmost results within their power. However, with a Russian numerical superiority of at least four to one—and more likely seven or eight to one—plus overwhelming tactical air superiority, we could not expect that the small allied forces in Germany could long hold out against a major Russian offensive. Efforts are now being made by the Department of the Defense to augment the strength of our forces in Germany; and it is presumed that those of the other Western Powers will likewise be increased. In my opinion, however, no such augmentation program can be fully effective, and, as I shall discuss later, we must at the earliest practicable moment rearm Germany itself.

So far as dependent housing for the troops in Germany is concerned, I found a somewhat anomalous situation. In 1949 our Armed Forces in Germany had under their jurisdiction some 16,000 units of family housing, almost all requisitioned from the German owners. Many of these quarters were poorly located for our purposes, and the general state of maintenance and repair was not good. During the past year some 6,000 units of family housing for occupation forces have been built to American standards by the German Government and its subordinate agencies. The cost of construction has been a charge on the German economy, but the buildings remain the property of the German Government or local housing authorities, and at such time as they are no longer needed by occupation forces will revert to German control. These projects appear to have been well planned and skillfully executed. I visited one unit at Heidelberg and was greatly impressed with the good design and high standards of construction. It is estimated by our military officials in Europe that the current program would by April of this year have provided dependent housing sufficient for the need of our occupation troops garrisoned in Germany. However, the augmentation program now under way for that country will again create a severe shortage. The movement of large numbers of military personnel to Germany will create serious problems in this field. I personally doubt whether it will be possible to provide sufficient family housing in that country to take care of the families and dependents of our service personnel there. From a security standpoint it is questionable whether dependents of military personnel should be transported to Germany. There are, however, other factors to consider, particularly the morale aspect, and the very serious social problems which must be faced if dependents are not permitted to accompany military personnel required to serve in that country for extended periods. I do not pretend to have a solution for this problem, but I earnestly commend it to your attention and suggest that the committee seek necessary information from the Department of Defense in order to evolve a well considered and consistent policy.

As far as the United States Air Forces in Europe are concerned, the chief need at present appears to be additional bases, better located for the purposes required in the event of war. Most of our existing bases were simply taken over from the Luftwaffe at the end of World War II. While the facilities have generally been rendered adequate, the bases themselves are not, in many cases, well sited for use in the event of hostilities. If our Air Force is to be effective in event of a war, it must have secure bases from which it can continue to operate.

So far as equipment is concerned, the United States Air Force in Europe is in much better condition than it was a year ago. Most of the propeller type of fighter craft, which served well enough in World War II but which are now obsolete, have been replaced by modern jet fighters. The provision of other necessary facilities and equipment to improve combat readiness must in many instances depend upon the location and activation of suitably located bases, as noted above. I recommend that the committee obtain, at an early date, a comprehensive evaluation and report from the Air Force staff of the air situation in Europe.

(c) Political: The major political question facing Western Germany today is the rearmament issue. I addressed myself to this matter during the second session of the Eighty-first Congress—in February 1950—and called attention to the urgent need of providing some military force capable of deterring, if not withstanding, a Communist drive across Western Europe. Unfortunately little was done about the matter before we became involved in hostilities in Korea, and the problem is now much more difficult. Whether we can, in the limited time remaining, create and train an effective German force is questionable. I regret to state that much of the thinking on this matter, both in Washington and Frankfurt, appears to me to be sadly out of date. The basic question is not whether we shall allow the Germans to participate in the defense of their country, or upon what terms our permission will be granted; it is whether and how such action can be taken in the available time. At my conference with Mr. McCloy he expressed the view that the German Government would cooperate on defense matters but could not be forced to do so. It is very clear that the Germans want two major conditions met before they undertake such a program. The first of these, and the easier to provide, is full equality for Germany. Practically, this means that the Germans would not be limited in the size of the units they would organize, and that their staff officers would participate equally with those of other nations, in formulating plans for the defense of Western Europe.

Further, it would mean that most of the present program for the reeducation or reorientation of Germany must be discontinued, and that they would run their own civil and political affairs. It would also, in my opinion, lead inevitably to the termination or drastic revision of the remaining economic controls. The second factor which the Germans seek is the assurance of a sound, workable defense plan. They must be convinced that the Western Powers have the will, and the capacity, to organize a successful defense force. For the Germans rearmament must be done speedily and on a large scale, or it will constitute merely a provocation to the Russians, and an invitation to national suicide. The proposals which have been recently discussed for the formation of German regimental combat teams do not meet the conditions and cannot, in my opinion, be acceptable to the Germans. One other consideration deserves mention here. This is that there must be some substantial military force or screen provided during the time rearmament is occurring. Specifically, it means the provision of sufficient mechanized forces in Germany and sufficient tactical aircraft in that theater to deter any attack from Eastern Germany or the Soviet satellites. How this can be provided under present conditions is a question upon which the committee should, in my judgment, seek the views of our best informed military leaders at an early date.

During the time I was in Germany, local elections for the land legislatures were held in Hesse and Bavaria. In each instance they resulted in major gains for the Socialist Party, which opposes rearmament. The results may have been due in part to local issues involved and the comparatively small turn-out, but the result is unmistakable. We must embark upon an entirely new program for Western Germany and speedily adopt measures designed to create conditions under which rearmament can take place.

My general conclusion in this regard is that the problems of German rearmament are broader in scope, and more difficult of solution, than is generally recognized by the American people. They present a serious challenge to our leadership, particularly those officials in the Department of State responsible for advising the President on matters of foreign policy, and in implementing that policy in day-to-day negotiations with other powers. We must have a complete new basis and entirely new program in Germany. Most of the changes needed will come about eventually anyway, but if they are delayed, we shall get no credit with the German people and little cooperation from them. In view of our record to date, in which we have had far more success in achieving the aims of military government and restoring economic health than in getting across our ideas to the German people, I cannot urge too strongly that we press for a speedy reorientation of our existing program in that area.

II. BERLIN

From the 26th to the 28th of November 1950, I was in Berlin, where I had the opportunity of conferring with several officials and observing conditions. Mr. Clark Denney, of the State Department, who is director of the Intelligence Division, Berlin Element, HICOG, gave an excellent report on the political and economic situation. Capt. James T. Babbitt, of the Berlin military post, gave a concise summary of the military situation; and Mr. Herbert Fales, of the State Department, who is in charge of the ECA program for Berlin was most helpful in explaining that program. At the outset, it may be well to state that because of its history and long preeminence among German cities, Berlin possesses an importance in the European picture quite beyond its size and economic importance. The average German regards Bonn as only a temporary capital, and I believe, looks to the restoration of a unified government in Berlin as a symbol of national unity. Ever since General Clay established his headquarters in that city in 1945, and more particularly since the airlift in 1948, the maintenance of our position in Berlin has been regarded as an expression of our determination to aid and support the free peoples of Europe. The conditions now prevailing in that city are summarized below.

(a) Economic: Berlin has not enjoyed the same measure of economic recovery as Western Germany. While business activity in the western zone is now at a level above that prevailing in 1936, the industries of Western Berlin are operating at only about 40 percent of that level. In part, this is due to the much greater destruction which the Russians were permitted to inflict upon that city; in part to the isolation of Berlin after the repudiation of the Potsdam agreement by the Russian government, and the later division of the city into two separate zones. Another major factor was, however, the blockade instituted by the Russians, coincident with the currency reform in July 1948. While Berlin was kept alive through the airlift, business life in the city came almost to a standstill, and has not yet entirely recovered. However, during the past few months there has been a marked upturn in business activity; and if this continues, conditions may be much improved by this summer. Two major obstacles to the economy of Berlin have been the reluctance of buyers, in the western zone and foreign countries, to place orders for goods, where delivery was subject to interruption by the Soviet authorities, and the shortage of credit. Some alleviation of the former condition has been achieved by the provision of an indemnity fund by the Federal Republic—Western German Government.

The work of the ECA in Berlin has been of marked assistance in providing credits, as well as in the alleviation of distress due to unemployment. I cannot praise too highly the work of our officials in charge of the latter program in that city, particularly Mr. Herbert Fales. As an example of constructive economic rehabilitation, I wish to cite the rebuilding of the Siemens-Schukert electrical plant in western Berlin. This factory, formerly one of the largest European manufacturers of heavy electrical equipment, was largely destroyed by Allied bombing, and the Russians removed most of the available machinery in 1945. During my visit to Berlin I went through this plant, which is now being rebuilt, step by step, partly with ECA funds. Many sections of the plant are in operation and others are being added from time to time. This factory, and its affiliated plant, Siemens-Halske, currently employ some 18,000 to 20,000 workers, including a substantial number of war casualties, in productive enterprise. No doubt the current rearmament effort in Western Europe has made it easier for this plant to procure orders, but I was greatly impressed with the spirit, determination, and energy, both of the management and the workers, in rebuilding and restoring the factory.

There is, of course, serious unemployment in Berlin—currently some 20 percent of the available working force. The current improvement in business, mentioned above, has alleviated this to some degree, and some relief has extended through work relief projects, of a WPA type, paid for by the Federal Republic and the ECA. No permanent solution, though, can be expected so long as Berlin is cut off from the western zone, and large numbers of political refugees from behind the iron curtain come into the city.

(b) Military: The military organization in Berlin has been simplified, and our forces strengthened during the past year. In place of three or four separate battalions of different types, we now have an infantry regiment under a unified command, which is responsible for the defense of the United States zone. While this force could not withstand a major Russian offensive, it is, I believe, capable of dealing with anything of less magnitude. The lesson of last May, when the Communist-inspired youth movement threatened to overrun the western portions of the city and was repulsed by the stern and determined opposition of the Allied commanders, particularly Maj. Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, was not lost on either side.

The establishment of local German labor service units in Berlin is an interesting development during the last year. These units, composed of young Germans, have been recruited as civilian employees and organized into a paramilitary unit, with the mission of taking over a substantial portion of the guard and security work from our combat troops. In conjunction with the unified military command mentioned above, such a change will greatly enhance the combat efficiency of our forces in that city. These German elements have their own noncommissioned officers and are equipped with only light weapons—carbines and pistols—for the performance of guard duty. Nevertheless they constitute a valuable auxiliary force, and could serve as a nucleus of a genuine military organization. I watched a group of them training at their barracks, and was much impressed with their high quality and evident spirit.

(c) Political: The political situation in western Berlin has been relatively stable during the past year. While the recent elections in Western Germany showed a trend toward the Socialist Party, which opposes rearmament, the local elections in Berlin did not indicate any such trend. The people of that city have seen too much of the Red Army and suffered too much during and since the war to believe in any easy solutions. They naturally favor the prompt rearmament of Western Germany as the only means by which they can be rescued from their present precarious position and restored to genuine economic health.

III. AUSTRIA

In Austria, which I visited during the period November 29–December 2, 1950, the situation is generally similar to that prevailing in Germany. The country itself is divided into four occupation zones—of which the largest and most productive is the Russian—and Vienna, in which all four powers are represented, constitutes an island in the Russian zone. There is, however, a unified Austrian Government which exercises some powers and authority in all zones. While in Vienna, I had the pleasure of conferring with Federal Chancellor Leopold Figl, leader of the Austrian Government. Chancellor Figl expressed the hope that Austria could continue its recovery, and his interest in a United States of Europe or other federation in which Austria could participate. Relations between the United States Ambassador, Mr. Donrally, and Chancellor Figl appear to be excellent and I believe that our representatives in Austria, both diplomatic and military, are making the best of the situation in which they find themselves. A summary of current conditions, so far as I have observed, follows:

(a) Economic: While much of the war damage has been repaired, Austria is not yet solvent. Her trade with Central Europe, particularly via the Danube River, is cut off by Russian obstruction; and much of the country's resources are exploited by the Russian occupation forces for their own benefit. The Russians have claimed, as reparations, all external assets in Austria, meaning those owned or operated by Germans at any time between 1938 and 1945. These plants and industries are operated by the Russians on an extraterritorial basis, pay no taxes to the Austrian economy, and comply with only such Austrian laws and regulations as suits their convenience. This continued drain on Austrian resources, particularly oil, together with the cost of maintaining the Russian occupation force of over 40,000 troops, constitutes an impossible burden. In an effort to maintain the integrity and solvency of the Austrian Government, the United States has adopted a pay-as-you-go policy for occupation costs, and has made sizable grants to Austria, directly and indirectly, over the past 5 years. This economic aid has prevented the situation from deteriorating further, and has resulted in some reconstruction, particularly in the field of public utilities, railroads, and public buildings, but it has not solved the basic problem. The ECA hoped to render Austria self-supporting by 1952, but I doubt whether, under the conditions outlined above, this can be attained. Only the termination of occupation costs, and some freedom of trade, will permit Austria to recover.

(b) Military: The strength of the United States forces in Austria the past 3 years has been approximately 10,000 officers and men. In addition to the administrative elements, and a considerable number of military police, this comprises a combat force of only one regimental combat team. Against the vastly stronger Russian forces already in Austria, and those which could be speedily deployed there, this garrison could not hold out very long. The degree to which it is feasible, under present conditions, to augment our forces in Austria is a difficult question.

(c) Political: The political situation in Austria remains relatively unchanged from 1949, or even 1948. The Treaty of Peace appears more distant now than it did 2 years ago; and without it there can be no genuine recovery. The United States Information Service and other propaganda media carry on a constant and vigorous campaign in that country in favor of Western ideas and United States policies. How effective this is, in comparison with the counter efforts of the Soviets, I am not in a position to evaluate. However, in my opinion, if given a free choice, Austria would welcome the opportunity to join a federation of West European nations. Meanwhile, we can only maintain our forces in as high state of readiness as possible, and strive to create situations in which a genuine settlement can be achieved. Fortunately or otherwise, the solution of the German problem—one way or the other—will probably carry with it Austria.

IV. GREAT BRITAIN

During the period November 24 to 26, 1950, I visited London. Due to the brief time available, and the fact that it was on a week end, my contacts there were limited to discussions with responsible American officials on the status of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and the progress being made under the mutual defense assistance program. I also had the opportunity, on my return journey from Europe, to stop briefly at Burtonwood Air Base, where our Air Force has a major establishment, and talked with Brigadier General Oliver, the commanding officer of that station.

London serves as the European headquarters for the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the regional headquarters for the mutual defense assistance program. These two groups which are in addition to the military attaché offices, have very sizable numbers of our officers engaged on staff planning incident to these activities. The staff organization and procedure impressed me as highly complicated and much too complex for any effective military operations. While there are seemingly innumerable committees engaged on a great number of staff studies and conferences there was at the time of my visit little or no clear-cut means for obtaining any decisions with respect to the issues involved, which simply progressed from one level to another. If this vast and complicated organization is to constitute or organize our defense in Western Europe, the Russians would be very close to the channel before any orders are issued. It may be hoped that General Eisenhower, as supreme commander of the Allied powers in Europe, will be able to bring some order and responsibility into this complex group; but it will require drastic action on his part. The principal achievement to date appears to have been familiarization of the officers of the armed forces of all nations with the attitudes, and procedures of the Allied services and the explorations of the problems involved.

As far as the general attitude of the British is concerned, there was no such sense of urgency in London as one encounters in Washington. The British are interested in rearmament, provided it does not interfere with their export trade, and provided further that a substantial share of the cost is borne by the United States. The British people have, of course, as much right to socialistic government and economy as we have to maintain a democratic capitalistic form of society; and their preference for one instead of the other is in itself no concern of ours. There are though two aspects in which we are concerned. Beginning with the British loan in 1946 and continuing through other credits and ECA funds and now with Military Aid Program, we have pumped over $5,000,000,000 into the British economy. In addition, Britain constitutes our strongest and most valuable ally in Europe. At the present time, under their Socialist direction, that country is unable even to provide sufficient coal to meet its own needs, and there seems to be no incentive for increased effort or output, on the part of either management or labor. I am regretfully forced to the conclusion that, under the present socialist government, Britain is unable to feed and support itself, let alone prepare for a major defense effort.

As far as the United States forces now stationed in Britain are concerned, our Air Force occupies and uses a substantial number of bases, the largest of which is at Burtonwood. The aircraft and crews which we have furnished are of modern types, personnel are rotated after short periods, and the commanders with whom I talked impressed me as vigorous and realistic. Our forces are not, however, I am convinced, receiving from the British Government that degree of assistance and support which should be furnished under a truly mutual-defense effort. I am afraid that the British take the view that we are using their country, in the form of an "unsinkable carrier," as a base from which to carry on our contest with the Russians, rather than contributing our forces toward the defense of their country. Specifically, provision of radar defenses around Britain has been very slow and is not yet fully satisfactory. Further, there has been no provision adequate for anti-aircraft forces to protect the bases against low- or medium-level attacks, and very few fighter or tactical aircraft to assist in such defense. These are elements of the defense program which should be provided much more readily, and at less cost, by the British than by ourselves. So far as our offensive mission is concerned, I feel that our air forces in Britain are in good shape. From a defensive viewpoint, I am much concerned. I believe that our committee should seek information upon this point at an early date.

V. FRANCE

Due to adverse weather and flying conditions, I was able to spend only 2 days in France. During that time I conferred with our Ambassador, Mr. James Bruce; the special ECA ambassador for Europe, Mr. Milton Katz; and the chief adviser to the ambassador, for the mutual defense assistance program, Mr. Bohlen; and the latter's two principal assistants, Maj. Gen. George J. Richards, who is supervising military aid, and Mr. Trueblood, who is in charge of the augmented military production, or industrial phase of the program. This organization illustrates what is, in my opinion, a major weakness in the MDAP, namely that the adviser to the Ambassador on military problems is not a senior officer of our Armed Forces, experienced in the organization, equipment, and training of military forces, but a State Department official, with little or no background in military matters. The result is, I feel, that in the Military Aid Program, which looks essentially toward strengthening our mutual defenses, our military personnel and advisers have too little effective voice; and decisions are too likely to be made on the basis of political or economic considerations. I do not mean to minimize these latter factors; but the Congress has approved the Mutual Defense Assistance Program, and appropriated vast sums of money to assist the European countries in building up their defenses. I feel that our Ambassadors, in the administration of such a program, should be advised directly by experienced, senior military officers, if we are to obtain results commensurate with the expenditures.

So far as the Mutual Defense Assistance Program in France is concerned, it should be noted that that country has received, and is receiving very large amounts of aid, both in the form of military equipment and in funds for raw materials, and so forth, for additional production. As to the military equipment furnished directly, or what are called "end items," shipments seem to be proceeding at a very satisfactory rate, after some initial delay in getting the program under way. The French have increased their military budget to some extent, and have plans for further increases. However, so far as their expenditures are concerned, it appears that a major portion will go toward the costs of the campaign in Indochina, plus routine operating expenses such as clothing, rations, and so forth, and that the United States is expected to furnish the major portion of the new equipment required for the additional divisions, both in the form of "end items," referred to above, and in grants to France for the production of military equipment in that country. We seem to have undertaken a very large program in this connection, the justification for which is not entirely apparent. The French now appear to look to us to bear the major share of their equipment costs, for reasons with which I am not familiar. The combat value of these divisions is a matter which I am not in a position to determine—even if they are fully organized, equipped and trained; but it must be noted that they will be made up almost entirely of conscripts—with many men drawn from areas and families of Communist sympathies, and particularly in the urban and northern areas of France, and that the north African native populace has become increasingly restive under French rule.

Furthermore, with respect to the equipment, I am unable to see why the United States must continue to bear such a large portion of the cost. France is a rich and productive country—probably the richest in Europe—and the war damage has been largely restored with the aid of ECA loans and grants. That nation was able, for the past 150 years, to raise and equip armies, and I see no reason why it cannot do so at this time. Since 1943 the United States has been called upon, or has assumed the burden of equipping French forces; until now the French seem to demand such aid as the price of their participation in the Mutual Defense Program. It is true that the French face budgetary difficulties, and have heavy expenditures due to the war in Indochina. However, our own budget is badly out of balance, and we face continuing heavy costs in Korea, as well as those due to our own mobilization.

My conclusions from all this are that in our defense planning, we have placed an undue emphasis upon French rearmament, and have assumed a disproportionate share of the cost, as compared to the probable results which will be obtained. Another major weakness in these plans has been the assumption that we had several years in which to build up defenses against Russia. If that were true, we could perhaps afford to commit ourselves to the re-equipping of 15 additional French divisions, over a 3 or 4 year period, and thereafter, possibly institute a small-scale rearmament of the Germans. However, I am convinced that we have no such amount of time, and that our defenses must be in order, long before 1954. To that end, I recommend that the committee scrutinize carefully all estimates of French participation and obtain from the administration a definite report as to the extent to which arms shipments to France are retarding our own rearmament.

VI. ITALY

I was in Rome from the 4th to 7th of December 1950, during which period I conferred with our Ambassador to Italy, Mr. James Dunn, his principal advisor on Mutual Defense Assistance Program matters, Mr. Jacobs, and the latter's chief assistants; also Mr. Leon Dayton, in charge of the ECA mission in Italy, and our senior military attaché, Col. John Harmony. My principal impressions are set forth below.

(a) Economic: With the help of very generous American assistance since the latter part of World War II, Italy has substantially recovered economically. The railroads have been rebuilt, roads and bridges repaired, and the drainage system of the Pontine marshes restored, as well as numerous other projects looking toward the rehabilitation of that country. As a result, I am convinced that Italy is in substantially as good condition, physically, as it was before the war. The chief economic problems of that country are, of course, those resulting from overpopulation and unemployment. I was advised that the ECA program in Italy during the current year was approximately one hundred and seventy to two hundred million dollars.

The director of ECA activities, Mr. Dayton, stated that emphasis was now being placed upon the encouragement of export programs which would have a long-range or permanent market, and readjustment to meet Mutual Defense Assistance Program needs, and supplement United States military production. It was his view that any cessation of United States aid would cause the collapse of the present Italian Government within a period of a year to 18 months.

So far as basic internal reforms in Italy are concerned, there has been very little actual progress. The ECA and the Italian Government have made a start on land reformation, but no large-scale results have been achieved to date. One of the chief obstacles to increased economic activity in Italy is the obsolete tax system, under which most of the burden falls upon production and consumption, and large numbers of wealthy people escape with little or no taxes. I was advised 2 years ago by Mr. Zellerbach, then ECA administrator, that tax reform was high on the program of the Italian Government. Last year, I was told by Mr. Dayton that it was imminent. This year, I am advised that an income tax is expected to commence—if the Italian Parliament approves—some time early in 1951. My own belief is that the Italian Parliament, like some other bodies, finds the overhauling of the tax structure and the imposition of adequate taxes for rearmament to be a burdensome and unpleasant task, which it will delay as long as the United States taxpayer will continue to furnish millions of dollars without return. I think the time has come to have a definite understanding on this matter, and the termination, not later than June 30 of 1951, of economic assistance to Italy.

(b) Military: Under the Treaty of Peace wtih Italy, which was concluded in 1947, the Italian Government is limited to an army of 250,000 men, and a navy and air force of 25,000 each. These numbers are small for a country of the size and population of Italy; but they do not yet, in my opinion, constitute a severe limitation, because the Italian Government has not thus far been in a position, to raise and equip even that number of troops. As far as the army is concerned the most effective units are the Alpine brigades, recruited in the extreme north of Italy and deployed in that area. There are also in the north of Italy two infantry divisions.

Most of the men in the Italian Army, other than the Alpine brigades mentioned above, are conscripts called up for relatively brief service and paid only a few cents a day. These factors and the shortage of equipment seriously limit the value of Italian troops. There is serious unemployment in Italy, and if conditions of service were made attractive, there is no reason why voluntary personnel in sufficient numbers could not be recruited. However, under present conditions, it would appear that reliance upon Italian troops can be only for the defense of their own country; and I do not believe that they could make any effective contribution to a European army deployed in other areas of the Continent. In addition to the regular army, there are in Italy two or three paramilitary organizations the best known being the Carabinieri, which constitute a state police force in time of peace, and the military police for the Italian Army in time of war. There are also several thousand finance guards, basically organized for the security of the frontiers against smugglers, and so forth, and a large number of security guards under the Ministry of the Interior, to handle local or internal disturbances. The Italian Navy consists of a number of sound but obsolete vessels, none of which is equipped with modern devices such as radar, or sonar. Under the MDAP we are endeavoring to modernize their equipment, at least to the extent that it could be used for coastal defense and anti-submarine control in the Mediterranean.

The Italian Air Force, which was fairly numerous before World War II, was almost completely disrupted following the war. It is now being rebuilt with our aid in the form of aircraft and equipment and should be able to give a reasonably good account of itself. Whether it is feasible for the Italians, with their limited resources, to attempt the manufacture of modern combat aircraft is questionable. They can, however, materially aid in the air defense of Europe with equipment furnished by this country and possibly Britain.

Italy possesses a considerable reserve of unused industrial capacity and labor force which could be utilized for the production of weapons and military supplies not only for its own armed forces but for other Western European nations. This is particularly true in the field of small arms and motor vehicles, both of which the Italians produced in large numbers before World War II. One difficulty in this line has been that of standardization, and the inordinate delay in agreeing upon a design. For example, I was informed that the Italians desired to manufacture the M–1 [Garand] rifle, provided we would furnish the raw materials and certain machine tools. It was stated that such rifles could be produced in Italy at a cost of approximately $20 each instead of approximately $100 each for manufacture here. While this seems attractive, there are several practical difficulties. In the first place, it would require some weeks, if not months, to translate the working drawings from English to metric units, and considerably longer to set up production lines and inspection systems at the factories. There is also the matter of training troops of the quality mentioned above in the use of a weapon more complicated than they are accustomed to handle. In short, I doubt the feasibility of embarking upon such a long-range program at this time. I believe it would be better to utilize existing Italian designs, possibly modified to take American ammunition.

Other examples of proposals for augmenting the military production in Italy might be cited. Some of them may be more feasible than that noted above, especially the matter of light motor vehicles in which the Italians have considerable experience. My general conclusion, though, is that if such production is to be available in time to meet our needs, the emphasis, at least at the present stage, must be upon types and items of proved serviceability, which can be produced in quantity without the necessity of redesigning, retooling, and retraining personnel. If we are permitted enough time, we may subsequently seek to shift over part of the production to more advanced types; but we should not delay the rearmament program in order to do so.

VII. SPAIN

During the period December 10 to 12, inclusive, I was able to visit Spain, where I had the opportunity of talking to several Spanish military leaders, as well as our Chargé d'Affaires, Mr. Paul Culbertson, and our military attachés. This was perhaps the most interesting portion of my trip and probably the most encouraging.

The Spanish are a proud and independent people, numbering some 28,000,000, and living, for the most part in a semi-arid land. Their country does not appear to be rich and their standard of living is not high. Nonetheless, they have an army of approximately 400,000 officers and men, plus a small navy and air force. Much of their equipment is of pre-World War II types, left over from their civil war. I found more respect and friendliness for the United States in Spain than in most other countries of Europe; I believe this is because we have not put them on our relief rolls, or promised them large-scale aid.

So far as the economic condition of Spain is concerned, that country suffers from shortages of many essential raw materials, sparse rainfall, and during the past year a serious drought, which has not only reduced the food supply but curtailed hydroelectric power production.

From a military standpoint, however, Spain offers a much more favorable picture. They have several major air bases, well disposed around the country, which could be used as secure bases for the air defense of Europe. Their army of 400,000 is, I believe, well led, and is certainly the largest anti-Communist force in Europe. Their navy, while somewhat obsolete, could be equipped for coastal patrol and antisubmarine duty.

I had an interesting conversation with Lt. Gen. Fernando Barron, Chief, Central General Staff; Major General Barroso, Deputy Chief of the Spanish Central General Staff; and certain other Spanish staff officers during the time I was there, particularly Lt. Col. Gonzales Camino, who was military attaché in Washington from 1944 to 1947. These officers expressed to me a friendliness toward the United States and Spain's willingness to assist, within its means, in strengthening the defenses of Western Europe, as follows: They made it quite clear, that under present conditions they are concerned with the security of their own country. Spanish air bases would be more secure against enemy attack than those which we are now using in Britain, and would, in my opinion, be of major value in case the British bases should be rendered untenable. We would need, of course, to install certain additional equipment and protective equipment, and to expand certain of these fields or bases. We would also need to assist in the modernization and strengthening of the Spanish Army. This, however, can be done at relatively modest cost and with little delay. At the present time they have the facilities for manufacturing additional small arms and ammunition, but lack raw materials. In the event that armored elements were required we should have to furnish them, along with any anti-tank defenses and some artillery. There is no question as to the anti-Communist position of the Spanish Government, nor the political reliability of the troops.

Numerous factors, which have been debated in the Congress over the past 5 years, have until recently prevented normal diplomatic relations with Spain, and prevented us from including that country in the defensive plan for Western Europe. However, the last Congress enacted legislation for certain economic assistance to Spain, and the President has recently appointed an ambassador to that country. I am thoroughly convinced that the defense of Western Europe requires the immediate participation of Spain, and the utilization of strategic air bases in that country. From a military standpoint we cannot afford longer to neglect so valuable a potential ally as Spain. I hope that the exchange of ambassadors between the two countries will be followed, in the near future, by the inclusion of Spain within the defense organization of Western Europe; and I am convinced that by such action we can obtain a much greater return, in military terms, for our expenditures than we are receiving in certain of the countries which I have discussed above.

VIII. GENERAL CONCLUSIONS

As a result of my recent trip, I reached certain general conclusions set forth below:

First. The economic rehabilitation of France, Italy, Germany, and Britain has largely been accomplished; and, with a few exceptions, the ECA program should be terminated at an early date.

Second. There is less time remaining for rebuilding the defense of Western Europe against Russian imperialism, than we believed a year or 2 years ago.

Third. The defense of Western European nations must be accomplished chiefly by those countries. We can only aid and assist.

Fourth. We must counteract, the unfortunate impression, created in certain European countries, when we superseded the defensive efforts of the Western Union with the larger North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and so forth, that it was primarily the defense of the United States which was involved, rather than the defense of Europe.

Fifth. We must build on strength, and not on weakness, and must find some means of utilizing, in the near future, the military potential of Western Germany and the military strength of Spain.

Sixth. The extent to which the United States should or can undertake to strengthen Western Europe, by means of American troops, must be carefully weighed in the light of our capacities, and our requirements elsewhere. There is nothing to prevent the Russians, if they desire, from creating another Korean situation in Germany, Italy, Austria, or several other places. We cannot achieve a strong military posture by deploying all our troops around a vast perimeter. Our principal concern must be the defense of the United States; and, unless we remain strong, we can neither assist other nations nor protect our own freedom.

AUDIT OF OFFICES OF CLERK OF THE HOUSE, DOORKEEPER, SERGEANT AT ARMS, AND FOLDING ROOM

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today a resolution to have the Comptroller General audit the records of the Chief Clerk, the Doorkeeper, the Sergeant at Arms, and the folding room, at the beginning of every new Congress.

It is evident from what has happened with shortages in the office of the Sergeant at Arms, the stationery room, and the folding room that such action is necessary. Surely we should practice what we preach. We demand this of other agencies of Government and we have not proven that we are immune from such an audit. I would like to call your attention to a resolution that went through this House on December 20, presented by the majority leader, and on which no one asked a question because of their confidence in the leader. This resolution was a very simple one, and I quote:

Resolved, That appropriations under the heading "Contingent expenses of the House, 1951" shall be available for such additional numbers of books, pamphlets, and documents as the Doorkeeper may find necessary to complete allotments to Members.

We were not told that this cost, to make up these missing inventory items, would amount to more than $100,000. Also, this bill did not go before the House Administration Committee having jurisdiction of such matters.

JOINT MEETING OF CONGRESS TO HEAR GENERAL EISENHOWER

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, the question whether American ground troops are to be sent to Europe and in what numbers is one of the most vital decisions of our day. It is my hope that we, the people's Representatives in Congress, will be given the opportunity to pass upon this matter. I regret that the President would prefer to make this decision himself without giving the people any voice in what course we take. Entirely aside from any constitutional argument whether the President has or has not such authority as Commander in Chief, it seems to me that he should be willing to take the Congress and the people into confidence, rather than simply standing stubbornly on his constitutional rights.

I propose, Mr. Speaker, that when Gen. Dwight Eisenhower returns from abroad to report to the President, that he be asked to appear before a joint session of Congress to report to us, and through us to the people we represent. If permitted by the Commander in Chief, I feel certain he would give us a full report on his findings and would make straightforward replies to any questions asked of him.

And there are indeed many questions that need to be answered before we embark upon a program of maintaining an American Army on foreign soil. It is one thing to send a contingent of American troops overseas to protect American citizens and property, and for that purpose alone. It is quite another to send a whole Army abroad to fight for people who may not even have the will, determination, and courage to fight for themselves.

It has been suggested that General Eisenhower simply appear before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. I have no objection to that procedure, except that I feel the entire membership of the Congress should have opportunity to ask him questions. There are military, as well as foreign policy questions involved in this program. There are questions that affect the lives of all our people, and all of us should have opportunity to get the facts. The American people are entitled to truth and facts. They are the ones who make the sacrifices.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I do earnestly propose two things: First, that the Congress be given the opportunity to pass upon the question of sending American troops abroad; second, that the Congress as a whole, meeting in an unofficial joint session, be given the opportunity to learn the actual facts from General Eisenhower himself.

A PLAN TO PREVENT WAR PROFITS

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, I find in my visits home to my district that people are growing alarmed and worried at the possibility that large contractors will make profits out of the present war situation and emergency. I have a very distinguished constituent in my district, Mr. Anthony Cucolo, who was written up in the Reader's Digest as one of the most unforgettable characters. This man came from Italy as a boy and has made his way and is now a successful contractor. He has a plan which to be sure is a little idealistic which would prevent profits being made on war contracts. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that this plan be put in the RECORD at this time. I would like to see some of us turn more to idealism and try to make it work. None of us would be here today had it not been for the idealism of our fathers.

The plan to which I refer is as follows:

SUFFERN, N. Y., September 18, 1950.

This plan would set up a special Army Constructors Service that would be composed of experienced contractors and construction men. These men would voluntarily join this service and be given a commission within the Army. In turn, the contractor can render service to his country by making his experience available to the Government. Further, he can save the taxpayers money by being allowed to operate any job as he would his own business. Army engineers would draw all plans for such contracts and see that the work is constructed accordingly.

The size of the project given one of these men would determine the rank of the individual. A contract for $1,000,000 or less could be handled by men ranking from captain to colonel. Above a million dollars the rank could be from colonel to a brigadier general. Anyone who joins this Army Constructors Service would receive his present salary if his services are acceptable, his pay and rank not to exceed his top-ranking officer.

Officers who are selected for this special service should be allowed to perform a job close to their home, if possible. This would mean more efficient and economical operation as the contractor already knows the people with whom he must deal and is familiar with the ground rules of the area.

Through this plan, the machinery on a given job would also represent a saving to the Government. Any officer who has machinery would rent it to the Government, if the Government wishes to do so. A market value would be set on the machinery and rental price would be according to the Rental Compilation by Associated Equipment Distributors, or as set by a Government agency. When the total rent paid equaled the value as set on the machinery, the rent would stop, and the machinery would become the property of the Government. At the end of the emergency, the former owner should be given the opportunity to buy back his machinery at a fair percentage of the value set. If he does not wish to purchase it, he should be given priority to buy new machinery of the same size and type if he so desires.

This plan would contribute the following:

1. It is an honor to wear the uniform of our country. This plan would give the older, more experienced men the chance to render service to his country and be proud that he has done his share along with the younger man at the front.

2. Eliminate the necessity to use influence to get a Government contract.

3. Not let the returning GI feel that while he fought, people back home got rich.

4. Give the Government a group of trained, experienced men to carry out necessary construction at lower cost.

5. Eliminate and save tremendous amount of manpower used to check the present system by checking costs, quantities, renegotiation, etc.

6. Give the Government a pool of on-the-spot equipment to carry on a job in any area.

7. By using the machinery available, it would mean a saving to the Government in purchases of new machinery.

8. Eliminate a surplus of machinery at the end of the emergency which would otherwise be almost a total loss to the Government of the investment.

A uniform makes a citizen proud. Gives him a feeling of responsibility not to waste money and be proud of his ability to serve and save.

COMMITTEE ON RULES

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules may have until midnight tonight to file reports.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

INFORMAL MEETING OF THE HOUSE AND SENATE TO HEAR GENERAL EISENHOWER

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARENDS]. I might say that an informal meeting of the House and Senate will take place some time next week. I am glad to advise the Members of the House that after General Eisenhower returns there will be an informal meeting of the House and Senate in the auditorium of the Library of Congress.

SERVICEMEN AND VOTING

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of this Congress to see that all servicemen have the right to vote, regardless of age.

As we enter into this defense effort, no one knows exactly where it will all end. No one knows how much armament we are going to build and no one knows how many men will be inducted into our Armed Forces.

One thing everybody is certain of—millions of our young men will eventually find themselves in uniform. It is up to Congress to decide what age groups will be drafted but we are certain many will be under the legal voting age of 21.

If a man is old enough to undergo the hardships and dangers of military life, he is capable of voting. In fact, he is all the more qualified to vote for the very reason of the sacrifice he is making.

Our country's future will be made safe if Congress grants the sacred privilege of voting to our young men in all the services no matter what age they happen to be.

Given the franchise of the ballot, our American fighting men will have a higher degree of patriotism and a realization that they are the policymakers of our country as well as the ones who carry out the policy.

While I am discussing the ballot, I wish to point out how unsatisfactory was the soldier voting in World War II. It was unsatisfactory because it was incomplete. Not enough servicemen voted.

Our duty, then, is not only to extend the vote to all military personnel regardless of age, but also to make it possible, through setting up proper methods of implementing a nearly total voting strength in all branches of the service.

This can be done if we profit by the mistakes made during the last war, the lack of coordination, and the failure on the part of many to take this all-important matter seriously.

Let us hope that Congress will pass my bill quickly to enable all our military forces regardless of age, regardless of rank, regardless of race, color or creed, to vote in National, State, and local elections while they are in service.

MEXICO

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, not long ago I had an opportunity to spend some time in Mexico and to observe the operations of the American Embassy and of our foreign officers there. In our great neighbor to the south where we need the warmth and friendliness and support of a powerful and influential ally I believe, as the world situation grows more tense, we are going to have the kind of support from Mexico which we will need and which we will welcome for our mutual security and benefit. We have in Ambassador O'Dwyer a man who, through his tact, diplomacy, his friendliness, and I may say through his beautiful wife, has done a great deal to convince the Mexicans that these two friendly North Americans are indeed simpático, and representative of the cordial feelings of their neighbors above the Rio Grande. Bill O'Dwyer is doing a good job, and I am glad to have an opportunity to say so to the Members of this House. He is a good Ambassador. Let him alone. Let him keep on with the good work he is doing.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.] has expired.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 30 minutes on Friday next, following the legislative program and any other special orders heretofore entered, on the subject of manpower and agriculture.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan asked and was given permission to address the House today for 10 minutes, following any special orders previously entered.

THE SUN NEVER SETS ON AMERICAN DEAD

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, Friday last, January 19, the House adopted a resolution calling upon United Nations to declare the Chinese Communists to be the aggressors in Korea. We all know they and the Russians were aggressors. Was the resolution adopted to breathe life into the dying UN, to keep it alive by a blood transfusion?

Why call upon the UN to tell the Chinese Communists they are aggressors when we, the United States, have Communists on our staff working for us in United Nations? Call on Communists to fight a Communist?

Apparently a Truman asked Congress to tell the Communists who are on the United States payroll in UN to slap the Chinese Communists in Asia on the wrist with a mild reproof.

For years it was Britain's proud boast that the sun never went down on the British flag—meaning that no matter wherever in the world the sun was sinking below the horizon, its last rays fell on the flag of the Empire.

Today the flag of the Empire and its people hide behind the flag of United Nations. Even Old Glory—the Stars and Stripes—the symbol throughout the world of liberty and freedom—is obscured by the flag of United Nations.

If we as a nation continue to follow the Achesons, the one-worlders, the internationalists, the women of America may well say that the setting sun never goes down on the grave of an American boy; that as the morning sun begins to lighten the world, it will never fail to shine on the cross which marks the grave of an American boy who gave his life needlessly, fruitlessly, following the internationalist impractical dream.

Would that the internationalists, whether they sit here in the House, serve in the executive branch of the Government, or loll in their stuffed chairs, in the swank clubs throughout the world, would hesitate and count the cost because in every land, in every ocean throughout the wide, wide world lies the body of an American young man.

TERMINATING UNITED STATES PARTICIPATION IN THE UNITED NATIONS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a resolution which I am introducing today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a resolution to withdraw the United States from the so-called United Nations, which has proved to be the greatest farce and the greatest failure, if not the greatest fraud, in all the history of mankind.

It is out to destroy the Government of the United States and to subordinate us to the domination of foreign elements that do not seem to have enough sense to govern their own countries.

It is trying to destroy our State laws, such as the alien land laws in various States, and to interfere with school laws and marriage laws.

Through its so-called genocide law, it attempts to punish individual citizens of the United States for committing "physical or mental injury" against certain racial elements; and would have those Americans charged with committing such "physical or mental injury," tried in foreign countries if necessary.

If all the American people realized what that means, there would be such a roar of demand for getting out of that Tower of Babel, known as the United Nations, that the Congress could not possibly withstand the pressure.

Not only that, but it proposes to declare wars throughout the world for the American people to fight; yet when the time comes, they expect us to do all the fighting and then pay all the bills.

Look at our boys now dying by the tens of thousands in Korea, as a result of the action of this so-called United Nations, without consulting the Congress of the United States.

Oh, I know the President called it a police action; but it has already cost us more casualties than this country suffered in the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, and the Spanish-American War, all combined. Now they want to send our 18-year-old boys to Europe, and possibly to Iran, and other sections of the world, to fight whatever wars this organization may be able to stir up.

It is honeycombed with Communists, and is literally flooding this country with Communist spies. Unless we get out of it, bring our boys home, and restore our Government to the American people, they are going to wreck this Republic and destroy this country physically and economically.

God save America from such a fate.

Resolution terminating United States participating in the activities of the United Nations

Resolved, etc., That (1) membership of the United States in the United Nations shall be held and considered to be terminated, (2) no person may represent the United States on or in any of the organs, agencies, or activities of the United Nations, and (3) no funds appropriated by any law of the United States may be used to share in the expenses of, or otherwise to support, the United Nations or any of its organs, agencies, or activities.

SEC. 2. The following provisions of law are hereby repealed: (1) The United Nations Participation Act of 1945 (Public Law 264, 79th Cong.), and (2) all other laws or parts thereof to the extent that they are inconsistent with the provisions of this joint resolution.

SEC. 3. This joint resolution shall take effect on the day after the date of its enactment.

NO NECESSITY TO OFFER CITIZENSHIP TO FOREIGN NATIONALS WHO ENLIST IN OUR ARMED SERVICES

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested that were we to enlist Germans or Japanese in the United States Army, it would be necessary to confer upon them American citizenship. There is no justification for such a statement. Nobody can acquire American citizenship except those who are extended that privilege under the laws enacted by this Congress. There is no reason compelling us to give American citizenship to boys of foreign nationality who want to serve in our Army and eat army chow and wear army uniforms and who might carry part of the load of mutual defense in distant areas of the world. There is no reason why we should not enlist Germans to help carry the load in Europe and Japanese to help carry the load in Asia. In each case their own homes are more directly involved than are ours.

There is no reason why we cannot make an outright trade with individual Germans and individual Japanese agreeing just what they should be paid and what, if any, other advantages they should acquire. There is no more reason why we should include American citizenship in the payment than there is why we should include a Ford car unless we want to include it. I do not propose to sell American citizenship that cheaply. The bill I have introduced, H. R. 1295, expressly provides that service under its terms shall confer no preference toward the acquirement of American citizenship. We do not propose to draft foreign nationals; we propose simply to hold out to them the opportunity of enlistment and say that if they want to serve under stated conditions, "all right," but if they do not like the conditions we offer, they do not have to serve. I do not make preferment for American citizenship one of these conditions. There is absolutely no justification for the statements that we must make citizens out of everyone we employ to do a job—unless the one raising this objection plans himself to support such an amendment to my bill. The bill provides exactly the contrary.

ARMY SEGREGATION POLICIES

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, this week, the famous Thirty-first National Guard Division, better known as the Dixie Division, is being mustered into the Federal Service at Fort Jackson, S. C.

The men who make up the Thirty-first Division are all southerners, and both willing and anxious to defend their country at any cost, as they did in World War II. Most of these men left wives and children to go into the service, and all of them are making personal sacrifices to answer the call of duty.

Now there are rumors that Negroes will be integrated into these southern white units under the shameful order of former Secretary Johnson, still in effect. These men and their families are not only disturbed by these rumors, but they are also indignant. The forcing of Negroes into the units of this white division would virtually destroy the effectiveness of one of the best fighting groups ever assembled.

If we are at war—and there is every indication that we are—the time has come when politics as usual should be recognized for what it is, and abandoned in the interest of our national security. The disgraceful and ill-conceived order abolishing segregation in our Armed Forces should be immediately revoked. It was born of politics, and was opposed publicly before congressional committees by military men of no less stature than Generals Eisenhower and Bradley. There is no doubt but that this order has contributed materially to lowering morale in our armed services, as well as reducing their effectiveness. I believe that our Negroes generally resent the order, and prefer to serve in units of their own race. Gambling with our security for political stakes should immediately cease, and this shameful order should be rescinded.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my distinguished colleague from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] in, and congratulate him on, his vigorous protest against the mistreatment of the white boys of this country, and especially of the Southern States.

That order wiping out segregation was a Presidential order, and could be, and should be, revoked by the President at once.

Our white boys in the service from the South are being treated like dogs under this crazy order.

I have before me a letter from a group of white boys from Mississippi down in Camp Chaffee, Ark. They say:

> We are being mistreated by a group of Negroes who are in charge of us.

They call that treatment "harsh and atrocious," and appeal to the administration for relief.

When that Presidential order was issued wiping out segregation in the armed services, I said it was one of the greatest victories that Stalin had won since Yalta. My fears are being borne out; yet, instead of revoking this order, the administration continues to permit the perpetration of these outrages against those patriotic white boys from the South who are called upon to fight the Nation's battles throughout the world.

That order should be revoked at once.

THE KOREAN SITUATION

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, on Friday last this House of Representatives adopted a resolution urging the United Nations, now meeting in New York, to brand the Chinese Communists as aggressors in the Korean War.

For a number of reasons, I do not think this action was well taken or proper under the circumstances. It looked to me very much like an attempt to take President Truman off the hook, so to speak, for his impulsive and ill-advised move into Korea.

The President knew, or should have known, that we were unprepared for the kind of ground warfare he started when he sent our forces to combat the North Korean Communists.

The President's own Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, earlier had said that Korea was indefensible, and that it was not included within our defense perimeter in the Far East.

But the rights or wrongs, the advisability or the inadvisability, of the resolution passed by the House last Friday are not germane to the matter I want to discuss at this time.

The subject of interest to me at this moment, is the circumstances under which the resolution was brought up in the House. If it is not, it should be of interest—of real concern—to all of you.

Members of this body were told by the Democratic leadership that no business of importance would be taken up last Friday. In fact, it was indicated that the sole business would be to receive and refer to the proper committee, a bill providing for future renegotiation of war contracts.

In view of the fact that customarily Congress is forced to mark time at the beginning of a session, while legislative committees get new bills ready for the floor, many Members of the House accepted the statement by the Democratic leadership at face value.

Particularly was this true of Republican Members, who had no way of knowing what was in the minds of the Democratic leaders. Although, I should add, they might well have suspected.

Thus it appears, to me at least, that the way was deliberately prepared for an unheralded introduction of the resolution, at a time when most of those who might have opposed it were absent.

That this unprecedented subterfuge was employed deliberately, it seems to me, is indicated by a statement made to the press by President Truman. He told the newsmen that he had been aware of the plan to introduce the resolution in the House.

Let me ask you if this is not plain evidence that the plan for such a resolution was discussed in advance by Democratic leaders and the White House? Was it not planned to bring up the resolution at a time when those who might oppose it had been gotten out of the way?

In view of these things, I was sorry to hear a statement on the floor, by a Republican leader, which appeared to condone this quite unpardonable resort to trickery by the Democratic leadership of the House.

Had there been the slightest chance of doing so, I would have presented my reasons for believing the resolution uncalled for and inadvisable.

Who thinks for an instant that a resolution by the American House of Representatives will sway a single vote, outside of our own delegation, in the United Nations. Those votes will be cast by representatives of sovereign nations. They will be cast strictly in accordance with what those nations consider their own best interests.

And let me add this. If any among you believes that gratitude for past or present economic and military favors, granted by the United States, will bear any weight in the decision as to Chinese Communist aggression, he is much mistaken. The record to date shows that.

No. As I have said, if opportunity had been granted, I would have taken the floor to oppose the resolution passed on Friday. I would have done so, not only for the reasons I have given, but also because I believed then, as I do now.

The resolution was intended solely to create in the minds of the American people, an illusion that Congress stands unanimously in support of the ill-considered and tragically mistaken policies of the Truman administration.

Furthermore, if there had been the ghost of a chance, I would have introduced from the floor a resolution, which I have since offered through the usual channels. A resolution, may I say, which is far more to the point than the one adopted last Friday.

This resolution proposes simply that the House shall go on record as unalterably opposing any change in Chinese representation on the Security Council. It would instruct our United Nations delegates to use any and all honorable means to prevent the seating of Red China. And it would provide that in the event Red China is seated on the Security Council, the United States shall withdraw at once from membership in the United Nations.

It is needless for me to rehearse for you here in detail the manner in which we have been betrayed by those who owe us the greatest debt of gratitude, to say nothing of billions in American money and American goods.

You know how we have been left to fight virtually alone in Korea. You know how the Security Council's failure promptly to brand Red China as the aggressor hamstrung our military forces, by preventing them from bombing strategic targets beyond the Manchurian border. You know how this has cost the lives of thousands of American boys, who otherwise would be living today.

You know how our West European allies have continued to trade with the enemy; how they have supplied Russia and Red China with aircraft jet engines, steel rails, and vast quantities of strategic materials. You know how this helped to guarantee our defeat, and to bring about the awful suffering of our young men in the icy mountains and swamps of Korea.

You know how our West European allies of the North Atlantic Pact have shown thus far small willingness to arm themselves at home against Communist aggression. How they have, in fact, apparently assumed that we shall defend their homes for them, while we still bear the brunt of the war in Asia.

You understand, too, without my telling you, the base venality of those nations which have refused, even to this hour, to admit aggression by North Korean or Chinese Communists, or by Russia through the Korean and Chinese stooge governments.

You know how those nations would reward the Chinese Reds, and through them the Kremlin, with a seat on the Security Council; another seat added to those Russia now controls. Reward them after they have thumbed their noses at the United Nations and all it is supposed to stand for. Reward them for breaking all the laws of God and man.

You know only too well, as I do, that a reward for wrongdoing, in the form of a coveted seat on the Security Council, would destroy the United Nations.

It would destroy the United Nations for all time, as a moral and political force in this troubled world. It would make of the United Nations nothing at all but a political and propaganda arm of Soviet Russian imperialism.

In that event, our position in the United Nations would become untenable. From a practical standpoint, we no longer could afford to remain a party to such an organization. We could not, with honor, retain our United Nations membership.

In view of these things, let me ask you: Are we going to let this program of craven appeasement run its full course? Are we going to lose honor, and the prestige so necessary in dealing with Asiatics, beyond all possibility of recall?

I think you will agree with me that this United States of America, this Nation of free people, must not, cannot, and will not, let such things come to pass.

CONCENTRATION OF INDUSTRY

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, according to press releases, the Democratic administration has decided to concentrate industry in several parts of the country instead of dividing it throughout the Nation, giving the industries of your district and my district a chance to manufacture the various needs of our country. We have marvelous and capable workmen at Lowell, Woburn, Watertown, and other cities and towns in the Fifth Congressional District of Massachusetts as I know you have in your various districts. To concentrate industry in perhaps four places, as I am told has been decided, would, in my opinion, be very dangerous insofar as enemy bombings are concerned. This would completely disrupt the communities where the industries are going to be located, also would disrupt the cities and towns that you represent. I understand also they are going to transplant labor from one community to another. You can imagine the suffering that will be caused by such a move.

I sincerely hope that will not be done.

GRATUITOUS INDEMNITY TO SURVIVORS OF MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES

Mr. SMITH of Virginia, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 83, Rept. No. 8), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to authorize the payment by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs of a gratuitous indemnity to survivors of members of the Armed Forces who die in active service, and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

PRICE CONTROL AND ROLL-BACK

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be question today in the minds of some about the wisdom of the House in adopting a resolution on Friday last condemning Chinese aggression. I do not think many of us would object to having a roll call on that proposition right now and, in my opinion, there would be no change in the position the House took on last Friday. I consider the House acted with courage and with good judgment.

But I asked for time to talk about something else. To me it appears that the most important thing before us and the Nation right now is the prospect that controls are going to be clamped on runaway prices. It is my earnest hope that without further delay we can stop this frightening thing call inflation and bring order out of the threat of chaos. I think the administration deserves every bit of support it needs in this matter and, for my part, I ask that prices be rolled all the way back to June 25, 1950.

THIRTY-SIXTH ANNUAL REPORT OF NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 48)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committees on Armed Services and Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

To the Congress of the United States:

In compliance with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1915, as amended, establishing the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, I transmit herewith the thirty-sixth annual report of the Committee covering the fiscal year 1950.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 22, 1951.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] is recognized for 30 minutes.

WHERE ARE WE GOING TO GET THE MONEY?

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, President Truman in his budget message asked for a total tax increase of at least $16,000,000,000 in order to initiate a pay-as-you-go or balanced budget. If the President's recommendation is adopted, this would mean a 33⅓ percent increase in the Federal tax load. We increased the Federal tax load $8,000,000,000 during the Eighty-first Congress. Now we are asked to add $16,000,000,000 more on top of that. The question facing the Ways and Means Committee as a result of that budget request is the well-known question that Congressman Rich asked almost daily, "Where are we going to get the money?"

The over-all tax problem is "to get the most feathers with the least squawk." Translated into modern language that means "to get the most billions with the least damage to American economy." We face that problem today.

The old saying, "The power to tax is the power to destroy," is both pertinent and true. It is pertinent today because we have already reached the point where destruction has started. What will happen if $16,000,000,000 more taxes are levied?

In the last 33 years we have had two hot wars and a cold war. As a result, our taxes have skyrocketed to unprecedented heights, and our economy now staggers under the load. How much higher can taxes go before our economy collapses?

People have always grumbled about the payment of taxes. When taxes rise too high people do not find it worth while to work hard or to work overtime; in fact, they take time off from work because what they earn above a certain amount is taken in taxes. This condition actually exists in Great Britain today. When taxes are too high production slacks off, a shortage of goods develops, prices rise, and then the Government slaps on price controls, wage controls, and rationing to check or suppress inflation. We have already arrived at that point in our economy. What will happen when we add $16,000,000,000 more to our tax load?

History records that in every instance where a nation has exceeded a tax load of 25 percent of the national income, that nation has had serious economic and financial troubles. Our total tax load today—Federal, State, and local—amounts to 25 percent of our total national income. If we follow the President's budget recommendations our total tax load will be 35 percent of the national income. Dare we place such a heavy tax load upon our people?

Mr. Speaker, before levying heavier taxes, or even before we look for new sources from which to get the additional billions we need to balance the budget, we should give serious consideration to reducing nonessential Federal expenditures. Both the Hoover Commission and Senator BYRD have pointed out where $7,000,000,000 of Federal spending can be lopped off from nonessential Federal expenditures. Senator BYRD in his recent letter to the President offered his complete cooperation in any move to reduce the expenditures of the Government; and in that letter he spelled out in minute detail just where and how the reductions could be made without in any way hampering or hindering the national defense.

Should we not insist that these reductions in the nonessential items of the budget be made before we consider adding additional taxes upon our already overtaxed people? A reduction of $7,000,000,000 in Federal spending would go a long way to make our task of trying to balance the budget less difficult, and at the same time it would be much easier upon the overburdened American taxpayer. We should give the proposed $7,000,000,000 reduction in Federal spending priority over any new or additional taxes in our effort to obtain a balanced budget.

Mr. Speaker, the four main sources of Federal income, given in the order of the amount of revenue they now produce, are: First, individual income taxes, $22,000,000,000 per year; second, corporation income taxes, $20,000,000,000 per year; third, Federal excise taxes, $8,000,000,000 per year, and fourth, customs and miscellaneous receipts, $2,000,000,000 per year; a total of $52,000,000,000 per year.

Can we increase the revenue received from these four sources without doing too much damage to our economy, and, if so, how much? Is there a better or easier way to get the revenue we need from an already heavily overtaxed people? Are there revenue sources as yet untapped? We must find answers to these questions; and the answers must be the correct ones—otherwise our already tottering American economy will be destroyed.

Tax experts have estimated that if we increase the tax rates of our three main tax sources—personal income taxes, corporation taxes, and excise taxes—we can, temporarily, under the stimulus of a war economy, raise an additional $8,000,000,000. They propose the following increases:

First. Increase individual income surtax rates 2 percent all across the board, and lower the exemption from $600 to $500, thus adding 7,000,000 more people to the tax rolls and bringing in $4,800,000,000 additional.

Second. Increase corporation surtax rates from 47 percent to 50 percent, and raise the over-all ceiling on corporation taxes from 62 percent to 65 percent. This would bring in $1,200,000,000.

Third. Increase present excise taxes and levy new excise taxes to bring in $2,000,000,000 additional.

If these tax increases are passed as temporary war measures only, with a definite understanding that they are only temporary tax increases for the duration of the emergency, these three fields of taxation can be made to produce an additional tax take of $8,000,000,000 without doing too much permanent damage to our economy.

But, Mr. Speaker, President Truman has asked for at least $16,000,000,000 additional in taxes, and we have only pointed out where we might raise $8,000,000,000 additional. From what source or sources not already tapped can we get the other $8,000,000,000 needed? The answer to that question, as I see it, is as follows:

First. Tax the presently untaxed cooperatives, mutual savings banks, savings and loan associations, credit unions, and Government corporations, all of which are now competing with taxpaying privately owned businesses. This would bring in $1,000,000,000 additional revenue from sources now escaping taxation. This action, taxing the untaxed, should be taken on a permanent basis, and not as a temporary expedient.

The Revenue Act of 1950 imposed an income tax on the business earnings of educational and charitable institutions—the macaroni factories, race tracks and lease-back deals that were becoming such a scandal. I have introduced in this Congress a new bill, H. R. 240, proposing to tax the business income of the rest of the tax avoiders which are exempt under section 101 of the Internal Code.

I fully realize that taxation of the earnings of cooperative associations has been a moot question before the Congress for several years. But I call to your attention, Mr. Speaker, an article just published in the December issue of the Michigan Law Review by Mr. Roswell Magill, former Under Secretary of the Treasury. His opinion as to the tax status of cooperatives, based on a recent independent and impartial investigation, should therefore be given weight by the Eighty-second Congress. Mr. Magill says, and I quote:

> Tax gratuities, or subsidies, in favor of worthwhile social experiments, such as cooperatives, may have been sound and desirable under the low tax rates prevailing during the first two decades of the income tax. They cannot be justified, however, in the political, economic and tax climate of the 1950's.

Second. Reduce nonessential Government spending, as specifically pointed out by Senator BYRD in his recent letter to the President, and thus save $7,000,000,000.

If the President is correct in his estimates, these two items taken together would provide the $8,000,000,000 needed to balance the budget after increasing the three main sources of taxation as previously suggested. If the Congress lacks the courage to reduce the nonessential expenditures to the full extent that Senator BYRD recommends, then there is no alternative but to levy a manufacturers' sales tax in order to pick up the billions needed to balance the budget. It is estimated that a manufacturers' sales tax of 5 percent would raise $7,000,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, a manufacturers' sales tax is a tax applied on production at the source, a tax that will be added to the cost of production and become a part of the selling price of the goods produced. This tax, in my opinion, should be used only as a last recourse. This tax is a hidden tax and bears heaviest upon the people least able to pay. It is, in effect, an upside down graduated income tax, taking more from the taxpayer in the lower income tax brackets in proportion to income than it takes from the taxpayer in the upper income tax brackets. This is true because the man earning $2,500 to $3,000 a year must spend every penny he earns for food, clothes, and shelter for his family, and thus under a general sales tax he is taxed upon every penny he earns. But the man in the upper tax brackets, $5,000 per year and up, usually does not spend his entire income. He saves some of it and under a general sales tax he is taxed only on that part of his income that he spends.

Mr. Speaker, a manufacturers' sales tax or a general sales tax violates the well-known principle of taxation—tax on the basis of ability to pay. How then can anyone justify such a tax The answer to that question is that it can be justified only if it is applied as a last resort, and if it is used in connection with or alongside a steeply graduated income tax. The justification offered is about as follows:

A graduated income tax touches or affects the man at the bottom of the tax heap not at all, but it gradually presses heavier and heavier upon the taxpayer as he goes up the tax ladder until at the top it takes away 90 percent of his income and leaves him only 10 percent to spend himself. A general sales tax or a manufacturers' sales tax works just the opposite to a graduated income tax. It presses hardest upon the man at the bottom of the tax heap because under it he is taxed upon every penny of his income—because he has to spend it all—while the man at the top of the tax heap is taxed, under a general sales tax, only upon a small part of his income—because he spends only a small part of it.

The only justification for a manufacturers' sales tax, therefore, is the fact that when placed alongside of a graduated income tax it makes what might be called a balanced-tax system. It can be likened to two similar triangles placed together to form a well-balanced rectangle. The graduated income tax triangle when placed alongside the general sales tax triangle forms a well-balanced rectangle.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have tried to present to the House, in simple language, an understandable thumbnail sketch of our Federal tax system. I have tried to show how the President's budget recommendations can be carried out without too much harm to our economy; and to point out the problems that must be faced and solved if we want to balance the Federal budget and initiate a pay-as-you-go basis for Federal spending. It will take plenty of courage to do the job, but it must be done if this Nation is to survive. The soundness of our fiscal and economic policies is our first line of defense. It is also the point where we are most vulnerable today. It must be strengthened and reestablished upon a solid foundation. Nothing short of a balanced budget will do that. May we have the wisdom and courage to do what must be done.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. As a matter of fact, what you propose will be absolutely ineffective unless we reduce nonessential and nondefense expenditures?

Mr. MASON. That is correct. I pointed that out. That is the first thing we should do before we tackle this job of finding new taxes and imposing heavier taxes.

Mr. GWINN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. I yield.

Mr. GWINN. Instead of taking this war as an excuse for further socializing us, why should we not make it an excuse for reducing the civilian side of Government within constitutional limitations, fixing constitutional limitations on that side of Government? Then we would not have the question of the timidity and the courage of Congress to contend with. How about that?

Mr. MASON. But it takes courage to do that very thing, and that is approximately the very thing that Senator BYRD has been urging during the last 10 or 15 years that I know of, and we have not had the courage to do it.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. I am glad to yield to my distinguished chairman.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman mentioned that it would take courage to do certain things in connection with tax legislation. Does not the gentleman think it would be possible to approach the passage of an equitable, fair, tax bill increasing the present heavy taxes without a great deal of courage?

Mr. MASON. I do not. I am afraid that we have not the necessary amount of courage to do the job as we know it ought to be done.

Mr. DOUGHTON. If I may I will ask the gentleman one more question: We all realize that we are going to have a heavy load to raise the amount of revenue that will be necessary in our national defense. Would not our load be made—I will not say smoother—less difficult and the load not so heavy if first of all before we increased the heavy taxes we stopped all the loopholes there are in existing tax laws? Would not that lighten our load and lessen the heavy burden of increasing the present high taxes? Could we not do it that way with less difficulty than if we do not close the loopholes and stop the leaks?

Mr. MASON. I agree entirely with my chairman, and that is what I have suggested in my statement.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. To what extent have we attempted to plug those loopholes?

Mr. MASON. To a very, very small extent. We have not even made a serious attempt to do it.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Has the gentleman's committee considered it very extensively?

Mr. MASON. Not extensively at all; they have considered it and brushed it aside so far. We did, however, in the 1950 tax bill, close up one or two small loopholes on educational and charitable organizations which compete with taxpaying organizations.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Assuming that the program that has been suggested of trying to meet the terrible burden that will confront the people, will there still be a deficiency, and, if so, how much?

Mr. MASON. There will be a deficiency unless we do as Senator BYRD suggests, reduce the expenditures, nonfinancial expenditures by $7,000,000,000; and we are not going to do it, and we all know it, because we have not the courage to do it.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. And there is less likelihood of doing it if we take the so-called one-package appropriation bill; is not that right?

Mr. MASON. I will illustrate that this way: I can take an old Ford and get a certain amount of efficiency out of it; I can take a Cadillac, one of the best cars made, and if I am a poor operator, I cannot get very good results out of it either. A poor operator could not get results out of either the one-package bill or a dozen separate bills.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. I yield.

Mr. CANFIELD. The gentleman has emphasized the importance of knowing what the probable expenditures are going to be before legislating on new revenue. Does the gentleman know that the House Committee on Appropriations is not yet formally organized?

Mr. MASON. I did not know that.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. Does not the gentleman think we can effectuate quite a considerable saving by limiting the franking privilege of Members of Congress?

Mr. MASON. No, I do not; and I have explained that in a weekly letter to my people. I have said that the Executive Department of the Government is spending each year some $150,000,000 to propagandize our people, while the Congress in toto has not spent a million and a half.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. One million two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. MASON. I am just using rough figures.

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. SADLAK. Whenever we begin to talk about increasing taxes there invariably arises the question that we could make up some of these needed taxes by having a national lottery. What would be the gentleman's reaction to that?

Mr. MASON. I am opposed to lotteries.

ARMED FORCES PROCUREMENT

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes, and to revise and extend my remarks and include a letter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, a suggestion that the staffs of the more than 500 active chambers of commerce in the United States be designated as voluntary area procurement offices for the Armed Forces, thus eliminating so-called 10 percenters and traffic costs, has been advanced to me in a letter I have received from Mr. Edwin MacEwan, executive vice president of the Greater Paterson, N. J., Chamber of Commerce.

It will be recalled that when we debated here in the House the $20,000,000,000 supplemental appropriation bill in the closing days of the Eighty-first Congress there was a discussion of 5 percenters and 10 percenters, and I reported to the House that these men were active in my congressional district. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] reported also that they were active in his congressional district, and there was other comment from the floor of the House.

I believe the proposal advanced by my constituent is one worthy of serious consideration. I am sending copies of Mr. MacEwan's letter to Mr. Charles E. Wilson, Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization, Mr. William H. Harrison, Director of the National Production Authority, Defense Secretary George Marshall, and Commerce Secretary Charles Sawyer.

The letter from Mr. MacEwan is as follows:

GREATER PATERSON
CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Paterson, N. J., January 15, 1951.

Hon. GORDON CANFIELD,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I am writing you again about another phase of the subject of civil and national defense. You and I have always seen eye to eye on the problems involved in activating our civil-defense organization as well as activating the procurement of goods and personnel for national defense. Therefore, I feel free to present to you and to all of the other Members of the Congress, if you desire to make this letter public, a plan making available totally unused resources in this country for the purpose of speeding up, in a most practical way, our national-defense program.

Very shortly the offices of our Armed Forces and all other governmental agencies, including the offices of our Congressmen and Senators, will be besieged by thousands of representatives of industrial plants, each looking for a share of defense production. Many of these men were 5-percenters in this last war but in this war we understand they will become 10-percenters.

Many of these so-called 10-percenters will be completely useless to the industries they represent but nevertheless will take much valuable time from you and other Members of the Congress, and also will unnecessarily take up millions of man-hours from the heads of our governmental departments, whose problems, even without these interruptions, will stagger the imagination of most of us.

Our plan would eliminate much of this, but in addition would provide voluntary area-procurement offices for Armed Forces procurement that would greatly minimize the difficulties while at the same time effectuating the program for defense procurement. We are proposing, therefore, that the active chambers of commerce throughout the country with paid staffs, which number between 500 and 750, be voluntarily drafted to cover specific areas and that these chambers designate a representative from their area to establish and maintain contacts with the various Federal procurement agencies, having available at all times complete facilities surveys, full knowledge of the products that might be manufactured, and other pertinent information referring to all industries in their community. All of this could be done on a purely voluntary basis by chamber of commerce executives, who are skilled both in the science of industry and in public relations.

I am quite sure that most of the chambers of commerce in the United States would immediately respond with all the alacrity at their command to a call of this type from the Department of Defense or by resolution from the Congress or a request from the President.

Many of these chambers have been actively cooperating with the Department of Commerce since its inception of the procurement services represented by the daily information on bids and the weekly service of contracts awarded. Some of us have even gone to the added administration problems and expense of putting men with engineering background into the field to call on industrial firms in the area in order to sell these Department of Commerce services to our industries.

We, in Paterson, through our Greater Paterson Chamber of Commerce, which covers an area including nine cities and towns, have probably developed this service to a far greater extent than have most chambers, but certainly many of us feel that the United States Department of Commerce, with the cooperation, of course, of the various branches of our armed services, are to be highly commended for making this service available to us and our industries.

Although there are probably nearly 3,000 chambers of commerce in the United States, many are quite inactive and would be unable to serve on the basis which we have suggested; hence I feel that 500 to 750 chambers would be a more reasonable minimum on which to place our estimates. Our larger chambers, for example, could very readily service the communities in which the smaller chambers were located in order to get complete coverage throughout the United States.

In our own case, we might very readily arrange to service approximately 3,000 industries that would make up the area comparable to area 1 of civil defense and comprising Passaic and Bergen Counties. However, I think it would be necessary, if such a plan were decided upon, to have it approved by the board of directors, but I think all of this could be accomplished in not more than a month's time with the proper leadership.

I understand, from having attended the Industrial College of the Armed Forces field economic mobilization course in New York last June, that we will be short a million and a half men and women to man our industries in case of an all-out war. This is another reason for the suggested plan described above.

If you think well of this idea, I should be very happy to work with any governmental departments in calling a preliminary and exploratory meeting of several of the top key chamber executives to discuss the possibilities of utilizing the chamber of commerce manpower to follow the lines which I have suggested above.

I think we could eliminate the need for using thousands of unnecessary "10 percenters," thereby reducing the cost to the manufacturers and our Government, greatly reduce traffic congestion on railroads and planes to and from Washington, and to procurement offices in all parts of the country, reduce hotel congestion in Washington, permit the staffs of our Armed Forces and governmental agencies to materially increase their value without increasing their staffs beyond a minimum, thereby making more people available for the actual work on national defense production.

We respectfully submit this suggestion for your consideration.

Sincerely yours,

EDWIN J. MACEWAN,
Executive Vice President.

SENATE

TUESDAY, JANUARY 23, 1951

(Legislative day of Monday, January 8, 1951)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Rev. F. Norman Van Brunt, associate minister, Foundry Methodist Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God our Father, all the ways of our need lead to Thee; Thou art our light and our salvation, our refuge and our strength. In this moment as we pause before Thee may these attributes stand out in bold relief. Inspire us to rise above our baser selves, with our crowded and cramped conceptions, to the place where lifted sights open to us the vaster horizons of our real place in the sun. In comprehending our own worth in Thy sight we take up the tasks of this new day. Give to us a vision of the far-off years as they may be if we, as sons of God, choose the path of righteousness for those who entrust to us the destiny of their tomorrows. In the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. McFARLAND, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, January 22, 1951, was dispensed with.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] are absent by leave of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

ASSIGNMENT OF GROUND FORCES FOR SERVICE IN EUROPE

Under the unanimous-consent agreement entered into on January 16, 1951, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 8), as modified, submitted by Mr. WHERRY on January 8, 1951.

The resolution, as modified, is as follows:

That the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Foreign Relations are authorized and directed to meet jointly to consider and report recommendations on whether or not the Senate should declare it to be the sense of the Senate that no ground forces of the United States should be assigned to duty in the European area for the purposes of the North Atlantic Treaty pending the adoption of a policy with respect thereto by the Congress. Such report, which shall be approved by a majority of the combined membership of the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Foreign Relations, shall be limited to the subject matter of this resolution, shall not contain any recommendation on any matter which is not germane thereto or which is in substantial contravention thereof or any recommendation either approving or disapproving the assignment of ground forces of the United States to duty in the European area for the purposes of the North Atlantic Treaty, and shall be made on or before February 2, 1951.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under unanimous-consent agreement, the time from now until 2 o'clock is equally divided, to be controlled by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY]. The Chair cannot recognize other Senators during that 2-hour period, unless one of the two Senators named yields.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution and all amendments or substitutes proposed be referred to the Foreign Relations Committee and the Armed Services Committee of the Senate.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Texas that Senate Resolution 8 be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Committee on Armed Services, acting as a joint committee?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, is that in order prior to the vote at 2 o'clock?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A unanimous-consent request is in order.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Texas a question. Of course, that suggestion complies with one of the main provisions in the modified resolution, for which I am thankful, if the Senate will agree to it.

There are one or two more things that are necessary. If the Senator would agree to them, I think we could come to a complete agreement on the resolution. All that is left is the proposal that the resolution, in substance, be reported back within a 10-day period. I do not wish to encroach upon the time of the Senator, but if the Senator would agree to that, that would represent the modified resolution. That provision is in the resolution as modified, and if the Senator would agree to it, the resolution could be adopted.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I cannot agree to any requirement that it be reported back within a certain time. That should be left to the wisdom and judgment of the two committees, with the overriding authority of the Senate to discharge the committee at any time and again bring the resolution before the Senate.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator once again: Is there any time the Senator would suggest within which he would bring back the resolution, which the committees will have the complete right to amend, so long as they do not destroy the subject matter? Would the Senator agree to any time when the resolution should be reported by the committee, regardless of what the Senator may do by way of bringing out a committee resolution of his own?

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator that whenever measures are referred to committees the Senate does not usually prescribe when they shall be reported, and so forth. I will say that we have no disposition to vary, we have no disposition to sidetrack the resolution. I do not want to tie the two committees by entering into any stipulation under which we cannot give the resolution full and complete consideration.

Mr. WHERRY. Would the Senator do one more thing? If he would do that one more thing, I think there could be complete agreement. Would the Senator include in his unanimous-consent request that pending the time the committees considered the resolution or any amendments thereto, no commitment be made until Congress determines the policy?

Mr. CONNALLY. I cannot speak for the President.

Mr. WHERRY. Would the Senator speak as the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will speak about that——

Mr. WHERRY. I mean would the Senator give that assurance as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee?

Mr. CONNALLY. I cannot give it. I have no authority to give it. I cannot give that assurance.

Mr. WHERRY. I am not going to object to the unanimous-consent request that the resolution be referred to the Joint Committees on Armed Services and Foreign Relations. That is perfectly agreeable to me. That is one of the important features of the resolution which has been submitted. I feel it would be helpful if the Senator would take the extra step now, which is not a very big step, and agree that the resolution be reported within a reasonable time. I will put it this way: Will the Senator agree that within a reasonable time, a fair time—and I think 10 days is ample time—the resolution be reported to the Senate with any amendments thereto which are germane? Certainly no one is going to object to that. If the Senator will agree to that, it will eliminate a vote, we will have a united front here, and it will be a great step forward in accomplishing one thing, which is that the President should not commit the United States Senate or the House to a policy until the Congress makes the determination of the policy. When the resolution is reported by the Senator from Texas—and I think 10 days should afford plenty of time within which to report it—then the Senate can proceed to debate it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I have given the Senator from Nebraska assurances that, so far as I am concerned, the two committees, acting jointly, will have no disposition to sidetrack his resolution, to postpone it, or to take up any more time on it than necessary, but I am not going to agree that the joint committee, if it may be called such, has got to report it at a certain hour, and a certain minute, and a certain day. That is up to the committee and the Senate. If the action of the committee does not suit the Senator, he can make a motion to discharge the committee.

The Senator from Nebraska refers to taking "one more step." I have come up to the precipice on his resolution, and one more step will engulf me. So I ask action on the unanimous-consent request as I have put it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas that the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Committee on Armed Services acting as a joint committee?

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. CONNALLY. I have already yielded.

Mr. McFARLAND. I wonder if the Senator would include in the unanimous-consent request that any other resolutions which may be offered involving the same subject matter be similarly referred during the pendency of the consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CONNALLY. No, Mr. President, I do not think it wise to encumber the resolution with other resolutions. Other resolutions which may be offered will be referred by the Chair to the appropriate committees. Some resolutions might be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, others to the Committee on Armed Services. We have plenty to do in attending to this particular resolution, without it being encumbered by all sorts of resolutions which might be submitted by other Senators.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield once more?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. WHERRY. If the distinguished Senator from Texas will simply give me an assurance that within a reasonable time, not necessarily 10 days——

Mr. CONNALLY. Who is going to furnish the definition of "reasonable time"?

Mr. WHERRY. I suggested to the Senator what a reasonable time would be.

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well.

Mr. WHERRY. If the Senator will furnish assurance that within a reasonable time the resolution as it is in substance will be reported to the Senate, I will agree to the Senator's request. I think it would be an excellent thing to have that done.

Mr. CONNALLY. I told the Senator from Nebraska that we were not going to sidetrack his resolution; that we were going to act upon it.

Mr. WHERRY. Within a reasonable time?

Mr. CONNALLY. But we withhold any limitation as to the particular time. If the Senator wants the two committees to report it in a reasonable time I cannot give any more assurance.

Mr. WHERRY. What does the Senator say about returning the resolution with amendments which are germane to it?

Mr. CONNALLY. What does the Senator mean by "returning" it?

Mr. WHERRY. That when the resolution comes back to the Senate it will be in substance as it is with amendments which may be germane to it. The Senator surely would not object to giving such assurance, would he? Such a provision is contained in all unanimous-consent requests.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not want to tie up the committees to that provision. I am sure such action will be taken, but I cannot give any guaranty in that respect. I cannot enter into any such agreement.

Mr. WHERRY. Will the Senator give definite assurance that within a reasonable time the resolution will come back to the Senate, and that whatever amendments thereto are agreed to will be germane to the subject matter? If the Senator gives such assurance, I shall be glad to go along with the unanimous-consent request. I would have full faith in the distinguished Senator that that will be done.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not going to make any promise of that kind for the two committees, because I have not consulted them about it. I have tried to be fair with the Senator from Nebraska. All he wants me to do is to swallow his resolution. I have already swallowed it and got indigestion. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I ask for action on the unanimous-consent request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I ask to modify the unanimous-consent request in one respect.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska cannot modify a unanimous-consent request made by another Senator. The Senator who made the request alone can modify it.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to suggest a modification, if the Senator from Texas will yield for that purpose.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, I will yield, of course, but it eats up my time.

Mr. WHERRY. Charge it all to my time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it would be fair to split the time during this colloquy between the two sides, which will be done, if that is agreeable.

Mr. WHERRY. I asked the Senator from Texas to modify his request. I do not care how the resolution is amended, whether favorably or unfavorably. What I wish is that the resolution as it is in substance, be brought to the Senate with amendments which are germane to it, if such amendments shall be proposed. I think such a provision is carried in the request, but I should like to have that one assurance from the Senator, and I shall agree to the request.

Mr. CONNALLY. I cannot give that assurance because the committees may decide to kill the resolution.

Mr. WHERRY. If they want to report it unfavorably, that is all right. I cannot complain about that.

Mr. CONNALLY. I cannot yield further. I have tried to be fair to the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request made by the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is referred to the Committee on Foreign——

Mr. WHERRY. Oh, Mr. President, that is to be done at the time the vote is taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent the resolution could be referred without waiting until 2 o'clock to take a vote. If it is disposed of prior to that time by unanimous consent, the Senate would save that much time between now and 2 o'clock.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I will tell the Chair what I am going to do. Under the assurance given by the Senator from Texas that the resolution will come back in the form it goes to the committees, plus amendments which are germane, I will accept the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I did not say that.

Mr. WHERRY. What did the Senator say?

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator cannot hear, let him turn the other ear around. I said that the committees would consider and report the resolution. But I did not say they would report it back in the form suggested by the Senator, or with any other conditions tied to it.

I specifically said——

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I am not going to object.

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to get this matter cleared up. As I understand, the unanimous-consent request of the distinguished Senator from Texas is that the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska be referred to the Armed Services Committee and the Committee on Foreign Relations, without any strings whatever attached, and there is no commitment that the two committees will follow the directive contained in the resolution and bring in definite recommendations, save with regard to the resolution itself. I understand that there are no strings attached to the reference of the resolution to the two committees and their acceptance of consideration of it.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator's understanding is very good.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request of the Senator from Texas, if the Chair may answer the question, simply is that the resolution be referred to the two committees, acting as a joint committee.

Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The action now taken automatically nullifies the unanimous-consent agreement in regard to debate and voting at 2 o'clock on the resolution.

Mr. TAFT subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the body of the RECORD, following the reference to committee of the Wherry resolution, a portion of an address which I delivered on January 15 before the Ohio Society of New York.

There being no objection, the portion of the address referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS MUST PASS ON AN AGREEMENT TO SEND TROOPS

The people of this country face today a constitutional crisis affecting the whole basis of government in the United States and the liberty of the people themselves. The effect of the President's claim that he can agree with foreign nations to commit American soldiers to an international force in any number and any place in the world without congressional authority is to eliminate Congress and the people themselves for all practical purposes from any part in the decision of foreign policies and the making of war and peace.

Congress has largely brought this crisis on itself by failing to assert any determined opposition to or criticism of any of the policies proposed during the past 20 years. In some cases, I think, a majority of Congress and of the people have been opposed to those policies, but when the President has made commitments, many in Congress who disagreed have voted to go along because they do not like to repudiate promises made by the President to others, because they do not like to oppose the power of those internationalist editors, columnists, commentators, and writers who have formed a close party line to support every proposal made by the State Department and smear all opponents and critics.

But in the past the Executive, even when he himself has made a complete commitment, has usually submitted the matter to Congress for approval, as in the case of the United Nations Charter and the Atlantic Pact. Now the President is asserting the right to make an agreement with foreign nations involving the gravest questions of policy which he says he will make regardless of what Congress thinks, and he defies Congress to attempt to take any action to prevent him.

This proposal to enter into an agreement to commit American troops to an international army is a completely new proposition and a departure from past policy. It is now admitted that the Atlantic Pact, while it may have committed us to provide arms for the other Atlantic Pact nations, did not in any way commit us to send troops to Europe. In his testimony upon the Atlantic Pact, Secretary Acheson was asked this question:

"Are we going to be expected to send substantial numbers of troops over there as a more or less permanent contribution to the development of these countries' capacity to resist?

"Secretary ACHESON. The answer to that question, Senator, is a clear and absolute 'No'."

On the floor of the Senate, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. CONNALLY, said:

"We are simply undertaking to modernize their existing armies which they themselves raise by aiding them in obtaining equipment, munitions, and supplies. But we are not sending a single soldier to any of those countries for combat purposes, nor are we insisting that they increase the size of their armed forces."

What is now proposed, therefore, is something new and changes the whole nature of our obligation. Of course the President today has power to send a few more divisions to Western Germany to increase the occupation force. But at the moment he hasn't got any divisions to send, and they are certainly not required today for any legitimate purpose of occupation—in fact, the present army is a heavy burden on the German people.

I believe that we should increase our land army regardless of European commitments to 1,250,000 at once, and so I have no difference with what the army is doing today in building divisions as fast as we have the facilities and the equipment.

The question at the moment is whether the President can agree to bind the United States to send American divisions in any number he fixes to join in the defense of Western Europe and, of course, to engage in any action which may be taken by an international army. Furthermore, the President is proposing to commit a certain number of American divisions to the command of an international commander selected not by him as Commander in Chief of the American Army, but by a group of nations. At the moment they may choose General Eisenhower. Tomorrow they may choose a British or French commanding general. The undertaking proposed is far greater than that proposed under the United Nations Charter and much more likely to produce war. It is beyond anything contemplated by the Atlantic Pact.

In the case of the United Nations Charter we approved a somewhat similar obligation to commit American troops to an international command, but the power was carefully hedged about by Congress. Section 6 of the Implementation Act provided for the negotiation of a special agreement with the Security Council of the United Nations providing for the numbers and types of Armed Forces, their degree of readiness and general location, and the nature of facilities and assistance to be made available to the Security Council; and it was provided that nothing in the act should be construed as an authorization to the President by the Congress to make available to the Security Council for such purposes Armed Forces, facilities, or assistance in addition to the forces, facilities, and assistance provided for in such special agreement or agreements.

With regard to the Atlantic Pact, the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate said in no uncertain terms in its report:

"The treaty in no way affects the basic division of authority between the President and the Congress as defined in the Constitution. In no way does it alter the constitutional relationship between them. In particular, it does not increase, decrease, or change the power of the President as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces or impair the full authority of Congress to declare war."

The committee recognized that this express provision in article 11 of the treaty for the carrying out of its provisions in accordance with constitutional processes might somewhat delay the operation of the pact, and they denounced that argument:

"It has been questioned whether a treaty subordinating action to the constitutional processes of 12 democratic nations offers sufficient certainty and immediacy of action effectively to deter aggression. The committee is convinced that it does. The expression of the will of a whole people offers far more certainty than any commitment by a dictator. The action of the democracies in the past great war is concrete evidence of their ability to act with the necessary speed in the event of an emergency."

The committee recognized that the carrying out of such a treaty, even to the extent of providing arms, presents a threat of dictatorship and that no such commitment of arms aid should be made, except by the entire people through their elected representatives. How much more is this true when American boys are to be sent to Europe.

I have been shocked by the speed with which blind partisans of the Administration have rushed to the defense of the proposition that the President can make war and warlike commitments. Senator CONNALLY on the floor of the Senate makes the extraordinary assertion that "The scope of the authority of the President as Commander in Chief to send the Armed Forces to any place required by the security interests of the United States has often been questioned, but never denied by authoritative opinion." He simply makes a misstatement when he quotes my father as having expressed the view that the President had the right to send the Armed Forces to any place where, in his judgment, their presence would contribute to American security.

As soon as I made my speech, the New York Times rushed out to get Professor Commager to throw together in a day or two a superficial article published in its last Sunday Magazine in which he asserts that the President has the right to start a war whenever he sees fit to do so. Time magazine makes the off-hand statement that history books have listed more than 130 cases where United States Presidents sent United States troops into armed action "to defend the national interest."

What is most revealing in this development is that there seem to be so many responsible people in this country who follow the party line of the State Department in foreign policy with complete blindness as to where it may lead, in spite of the fact that it has led us a long way toward disaster today; and in so doing blithely dismiss all interest in the maintenance of popular government under the Constitution. They are obviously afraid of popular government, thinking the people are too dumb to understand foreign policy, and might oppose policies which seem to lead to war.

Of course the claims made for unlimited power to commit troops are based on the most superficial arguments. If they are sound the provision in the Constitution that only Congress can raise and support armies and declare war is null and void, for in this case there is not the slightest claim that Congress has authorized the President to do what he is proposing to do.

In looking at the precedents, the first obvious distinction is that between the right of the President to do something, and his power. In some cases Presidents have exercised the power when they had no right to do so, as did President Truman himself in the case of Korea. My father pointed out that the President obviously has power to do things which involve consequences that it would be quite beyond his power under the Constitution directly to effect. He refers to the beginning of the Mexican War by President Polk. But regardless of the President's power, if he has no right, Congress is entitled to take every legal step to defeat the President's purpose.

In the second place, Professor Commager and others completely confuse the right of the President as Commander in Chief to run a war after it has begun and his right to make agreements with other nations as to peacetime furnishing of troops, and as to how he will run a war if it occurs. These are matters clearly in the nature of treaties and just as solemnly important. Of course Congress should not attempt, as it has at times, actually to participate in the conduct of a war, but until war is declared its right to restrain warlike actions is fully justified.

I have pointed out that the sending of troops to support the United Nations, as in Korea, was absolutely prohibited by law until Congress acted and that the President's action there was completely unauthorized. It has been incorrectly asserted, both by Time and by Professor Commager, that President McKinley sent United States soldiers into China to help quell the Boxer Rebellion. Of course, he did no such thing. He sent troops into China together with other national forces to rescue the legations in Pekin, who were threatened with extermination by the Boxers. They marched to Pekin, exacted indemnity from the legal government and they marched out again. The landing of troops in various parts of South America was always undertaken for the purpose of protecting American citizens and American property. Time cites the action of President Jefferson in sending a naval expedition to war with the Barbary pirates. In this case again, the pirates in violation of international law were attacking American ships, and the American Navy was sent after them to defend American property. With complete inaccuracy, Time says that in 1912 President Taft established an American protectorate over Nicaragua with the marines in charge. This protectorate was established under President Wilson. President Taft landed marines to protect American property threatened by insurrectionists against the established and recognized government.

As I have pointed out, there are cases like President Polk's attack on Mexico, which was wholly unauthorized and was simply a usurpation of authority by the President.

Professor Commager points out that the general power of the President to execute the laws also extends to the execution of treaties. But certainly the act of the President must be one authorized by the treaty as approved by the Senate. I cannot see why a treaty should change the distribution of powers between the President and Congress with regard to the performance of acts allotted to them respectively by the Constitution, unless there is at least an implied transfer of power from Congress to the President. There was no such transfer; in fact it is expressly denied by the Atlantic Pact. Professor Commager entirely ignores the express provisions of the law relating to the implementation of the United Nations Charter, and he ignores the express provision of the Atlantic Pact that it can only be carried out through the constitutional processes of the nation involved, the meaning of which was made clear by the Committee on Foreign Relations in the report to which I have referred.

Whatever the right of the President may be, it seems to me clear that under the Constitution it cannot extend to the deliberate making of aggressive war, and it cannot extend to the commitment of troops to an international command, or to a binding commitment as to when, how, and where we will fight a future war, unless we are prepared to set up a dictator in the United States. The basic liberties of the people of this country are imperiled unless we can retain in Congress the right to pass on policies which involve the very life and being of the American people.

The danger has been made crystal clear by the results of the abuse of the powers of the President in recent years, by the unauthorized agreements made at Yalta which set up Soviet Russia in a position where it dominates Europe and Asia today, by the beginning of a war in Korea presenting one of the most disastrous defeats in the history of the United States. Congress must reassert its constitutional rights to pass upon fundamental principles of foreign policy, or wholly fail in its obligation to the people whom it represents.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore entered, Senate Resolution 43 is the unfinished business. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report it within 1 week.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

By unanimous consent, the following routine business was transacted:

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

REPORT ON TORT CLAIMS PAID BY STATE DEPARTMENT

A letter from the Secretary of State, reporting, pursuant to law, on tort claims paid by the Department of State during the calendar year 1950; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A letter from the representatives of the United States in the Canadian River compact negotiations, transmitting a copy of the compact entered into by the States of New Mexico, Texas, and Oklahoma, setting forth the rights and obligations of those States in the use of the waters of the Canadian River Basin (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

INTERSTATE CIVIL DEFENSE COMPACT RATIFIED BY GOVERNOR OF MASSACHUSETTS

A letter from the Governor of Massachusetts, transmitting a copy of an interstate civil defense compact entered into and ratified by him on behalf of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Armed Services.

PETITIONS

Petitions were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A letter from Clara McDonald, president, United Patriotic People, United States of America, formerly Peoples' Lobby of California, and a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Peoples' Lobby of California, both of Los Angeles, Calif., relating to the withdrawal of troops from Korea, etc.; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. MAGNUSON:

A resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Washington; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

"Whereas our sons and daughters are fighting in Korea; and

"Whereas it is desirable to strengthen our defense program; and

"Whereas one Paul Robeson has publicly declared it to be his opinion that colored citizens would not fight against Russia in the event of war; and

"Whereas the colored citizens of our State are loyal to the United States and the State of Washington and are now fighting side by side with other citizens of our State in Korea and elsewhere: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the house, That we hereby commend all citizens of the State now engaged in the defense of the country and declare that the utterances of said Paul Robeson do not reflect the attitude of the colored people of the State of Washington; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Senators and Representatives in Washington from the State of Washington and the Attorney General of the United States."

ADDITIONAL PERSONNEL FOR COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICE AND CIVIL SERVICE—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, from the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, I report favorably, without amendment, Senate Resolution 19, authorizing the temporary employment of additional personnel by the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, and I submit a report (No. 34) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution. The resolution calls for the expenditure of money. It will take no time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised by the Parliamentarian that under the rule the resolution must be referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration. Under those circumstances the Chair refers the resolution to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

STUDY OF HEALTH INSURANCE PLANS IN UNITED STATES—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, from the Committe on Labor and Public Welfare, I report favorably, without amendment, Senate Resolution 39, extending the authority for a study of health insurance plans in the United States, and I submit a report (No. 33) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be received, and, under the rule, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

EXPENDITURES BY COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McCLELLAN, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 51) authorizing the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments to employ temporary additional personnel and increase the limit of expenditures, which, under the rule, was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That in holding hearings, reporting such hearings, and making investigations as authorized by subsection (g) (2) (B) of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, or any other duties imposed upon it, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized during the period beginning on February 1, 1951, and ending on January 31, 1952, to make such expenditures, and to employ upon a temporary basis such investigators, and such technical, clerical, and other assistants, as it deems advisable.

SEC. 2. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $100,000, in addition to any unexpended balance under Senate Resolution 206, Eighty-first Congress, second session, agreed to February 1, 1950, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee or subcommittee, as the case may be.

[Mr. MARTIN asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial regarding the aggression of Red China, published in the Pittsburgh Press, January 18, 1951, which appears in the Appendix.]

THE FAREWELL OF SCOTT LUCAS—EDITORIAL FROM THE MILWAUKEE JOURNAL

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, on the last day of the Eighty-first Congress Senator Scott Lucas made a farewell speech to his colleagues in the United States Senate. His address, which was free of all bitterness or political implications, was a moving plea for national unity in this time of crisis. It was one of the most patriotic and convincing addresses on this vital and compelling subject which I have heard. It has received wide and highly favorable comment in the press of the Nation.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an editorial from the Milwaukee Journal dated January 3, 1951, entitled "The Farewell of Scott Lucas."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FAREWELL OF SCOTT LUCAS

It was said around the Capitol in Washington this week that Scott Lucas, of Illinois, saved his greatest speech for a farewell from the United States Senate.

It was a plea for national unity in this time of crisis. It was so moving that the senatorial Members of the Eighty-first Congress, convened for the last time, rose in spontaneous ovation to their retiring majority floor leader.

There was no hint of bitterness at his defeat in November, no mourning about his departure from Congress after 16 years. There was no criticism of those before him, Democrats or Republicans, who had made his 2 years as majority leader such difficult ones. This was but the voice of a patriotic American, well informed of the dangers that beset his Nation and fearful of the future, calling for all citizens, and particularly those in positions of leadership, to join hands in the common cause. Here are the most pertinent phrases:

"We are passing through the most extraordinary and dangerous days since the birth of this Republic. * * * The things that have made this country the envy of the world, our cherished institutions, our respect for the dignity of the human being, our high standard of living, are in mortal danger of destruction. * * * We can destroy all of the things that made America great if we continue to quarrel among ourselves.

"The time for idle chatter is over. * * * The hour has passed when men in high positions, for the sake of some political advantage, can, without jeopardizing their country's safety, fire the imagination of the emotional and the uninformed with reckless and irresponsible charges.

"Will it be necessary for the Kremlin to drop a bomb on Washington before we obtain the unity that we ought to have in this crisis?

"I firmly believe that the administration, through its leaders, and the leaders of the minority in Congress, should lay aside every political or other consideration and compromise their differences on foreign policy * * * the political veneer corroding our foreign policy should be removed lest the body politic suffer a national disaster. * * * We cannot win a war, nor can we win a peace, hopelessly divided."

This newspaper hopes that the leaders of our Nation will heed this warning from Mr. Lucas, and that they will heed his sound words of advice—that we put aside the senseless quarreling, the divisive arguments, the political maneuvering for a less dangerous day.

CONSIDERATION OF NOMINATIONS

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, as in executive session, I should like to ask for confirmation of the nominations on the Executive Calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona requests unanimous consent that, as in executive session, the Senate consider the nominations on the Executive Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will state the nominations on the calendar.

DEFENSE PRODUCTION ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of William H. Harrison, of New York, to be Defense Production Administrator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is——

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I reserve the right to object to this nomination.

Some time ago I said there are various States which have received no major appointments relating to policy matters, among them being the great State of North Dakota.

I hold in my hand, for example, a list of the States from which the various Cabinet members have come.

So far as the Secretary of State is concerned, I find that the following States have had residents appointed to that office: Virginia, again Virginia, Massachusetts, again Massachusetts, Virginia, Virginia, Maryland, Virginia, Massachusetts, Kentucky, New York, Louisiana, Delaware, Georgia, Georgia, Massachusetts, Massachusetts, South Carolina, Virginia, South Carolina, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Massachusetts, Massachusetts, New York, Michigan, Pennsylvania, New York, New York, Illinois, New York, New York, Maine, New Jersey, Delaware, Maine, Indiana, Illinois, Massachusetts, Ohio, Ohio, Ohio, Ohio, New York, New York, Pennsylvania, Nebraska, New York, New York, New York, New York, Minnesota, New York, Tennessee, Virginia, South Carolina, and Pennsylvania.

Now I come to the office of the Secretary of the Treasury. We find that there have been appointed to that office men from the States of New York, Connecticut, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Pennsylvania, Georgia, Georgia, Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Pennsylvania, Maryland, New Hampshire, New Hampshire, Ohio, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, Kentucky, Mississippi, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kentucky, Georgia, Maryland, New York, Ohio, Maine, Indiana, Indiana, Massachusetts, Massachusetts, Kentucky, Maine, Ohio, Minnesota, New York, Indiana, Indiana, New York, Minnesota, Ohio, Kentucky, Illinois, Illinois, Iowa, New York, Illinois, New York, Virginia, Missouri, Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania, New York, New York, New York, Kentucky, and Maine.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I decline to yield at this time.

I now come to the office of Secretary of War. We find that there have been appointed to that office men coming from the States of Massachusetts, Massachusetts, Maine, Maine, Virginia, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New York, Virginia, Georgia, Kentucky, Virginia, South Carolina, Virginia, New York, Tennessee, Ohio, New York, South Carolina, Tennessee, Tennessee, Ohio, New York, Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania, New York, Georgia, Missouri, Louisiana, Mississippi, Virginia, Kentucky, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Ohio, Illinois, Illinois, Illinois, Illinois, Ohio, Iowa, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Iowa, Minnesota, Illinois, Illinois, Massachusetts, Vermont, West Virginia, New York, Michigan, New York, New York, Ohio, Tennessee, Tennessee, New York, New Jersey, Ohio, Massachusetts, Massachusetts, Missouri, Iowa, Oklahoma, Utah, Kansas, New York, New York, and North Carolina.

Now I come to the Office of Attorney General of the United States. We find that the following States have had representation in that office: Virginia, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Virginia, Massachusetts, Massachusetts, Maryland, Kentucky, Delaware, Delaware, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Virginia, Georgia, Maryland, New York, New York, Tennessee, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Kentucky, South Carolina, Maryland, Virginia, Maine, Connecticut, Maryland, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Missouri, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Kentucky, Ohio, New York, Massachusetts, Georgia, Oregon, New York, Ohio, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania, Arkansas, Indiana, Massachusetts, Ohio, California, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Maryland, New York, Tennessee, Texas, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Ohio, New York, Vermont, Minnesota, Connecticut, Michigan, New York, Pennsylvania and Texas.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I decline to yield at this time. I regretfully decline to yield. I am sorry.

Mr. IVES. I shall wait.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I come now to the office of Postmaster General of the United States. We find that the following States have been represented by men who have served in that office: Massachusetts, Massachusetts, Georgia, Georgia, Georgia, Connecticut, Connecticut, Ohio, Ohio, Ohio, Ohio, Kentucky, Kentucky, Kentucky, Connecticut, New York, New York, Kentucky, Tennessee, Vermont, New York, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Ohio, Ohio, Wisconsin, Maryland, Virginia, Connecticut, Indiana, Tennessee, Tennessee, New York, Wisconsin, Indiana, Iowa, Wisconsin, Michigan, Pennsylvania, New York, West Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, New York, Massachusetts, Massachusetts, Texas, Indiana, Connecticut, Colorado, Indiana, Indiana, Ohio, New York, Pennsylvania, Missouri, and Illinois.

I come now to the office of Secretary of the Navy. We find that men have been appointed to that office from the following States: Maryland, Maryland, Maryland, Massachusetts, South Carolina, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, New Jersey, North Carolina, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, Massachusetts, Virginia, Virginia, Massachusetts, Vermont, Virginia, North Carolina, Maryland, North Carolina, Connecticut, Connecticut, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Indiana, West Virginia, Louisiana, New Hampshire, New York, New York, Alabama, Massachusetts, Massachusetts, Massachusetts, Illinois, Maryland, California, Michigan, Massachusetts, North Carolina, Michigan, Michigan, California, Massachusetts, Virginia, New Jersey, Illinois, and New York.

We now come to Secretaries of the Interior. I call attention to the fact that most of our public land is in the western part of the United States. There are 45,000,000 acres of public land there. We find that, to take care of that public land, Secretaries of the Interior have been chosen from Ohio, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Michigan, Mississippi, Indiana, Indiana, Indiana, Iowa, Illinois, Ohio, Ohio, Michigan, Missouri, Iowa, Colorado, Michigan, Mississippi, Wisconsin, Missouri, Georgia, Missouri, New York, Missouri, Missouri, Ohio, Washington, Illinois, California, Virginia, New Mexico, New Mexico, Colorado, Illinois, California, Illinois, Illinois, and Wisconsin.

We now come to the office of Secretary of Commerce, and to the men who have been appointed to that office. I call attention to the fact that, since I have been in the Senate, six men from the State of New York were in the Cabinet at the same time. For the office of Secretary of Commerce, men have been chosen from New York, California, New York, Missouri, New York, Missouri, California, California, Massachusetts, Illinois, Michigan, South Carolina, Iowa, Texas, Iowa, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania, Virginia, New York, and Washington.

We now come to the office of Secretary of Agriculture. We find that, since the creation of the office, under Grover Cleveland, men have been chosen for the office of Secretary of Agriculture from Missouri, Wisconsin, Nebraska, Iowa, Iowa, Iowa, Maine, Iowa, Iowa, West Virginia, Kansas, Missouri, Iowa, Indiana, New Mexico, and Colorado.

We now come to the office of Secretary of Defense. The nomination shown on the Executive Calendar today of William H. Harrison of New York is for the office of Defense Production Administrator.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I decline to yield at this time. I am sorry I am unable to yield to the distinguished Senator from New York. Since the office of Secretary of Defense was created, there had been but one appointment, up to the time of the appointment of Mr. Marshall, and that was from New York.

Mr. President, I shall not enter upon any extended debate in regard to the nomination of William H. Harrison to be Defense Production Administrator. I shall not even object to it. But I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the record shows that there are a great many States, including North Dakota, which have not had an appointment to a Cabinet position in the entire history of the country. Whether in the arts or in the sciences, in medicine or in business, whenever North Dakota men and women have had an equal opportunity under the competitive system of the United States, they have gone to the very top. As I told the Senate on previous occasions if we suppose that today my distinguished friend, the senior Senator from New York, became ill, he would probably be sent to Rochester, Minn., to the Mayo Clinic, which is perhaps the outstanding clinic in this country. If the doctors at the clinic were unable to agree upon a diagnosis, but felt that an operation was necessary, who, in that great institution, would ultimately decide the nature of the operation to be made upon my distinguished friend? It would be a doctor who was once a North Dakota boy, a boy so poor that when he attended the University of North Dakota he found it necessary to walk there from his farm near Inkster, sometimes without shoes, because his parents could not afford them. Today he is at Mayo Clinic, where he is the outstanding physician and surgeon. He is the man who today would have the ultimate say and he would decide the nature of the operation to be performed.

Today, anywhere in this country a woman who wants to buy a refrigerator may inquire in the markets in order that she may find the refrigerator which she believes is best. If she were to select a Kelvinator, she would learn perhaps that the president of that great refrigerator concern came from North Dakota, a man by the name of George Mason, born at Valley City.

Likewise, a farmer residing anywhere in the United States desiring to purchase a good truck, would probably obtain information regarding all the trucks manufactured in the country in order that he might obtain the best. If he did, he probably would go finally to General Motors. If he bought a truck there, it would be a truck known as the Fargo truck, a truck engineered and built under the direction of a man named Grant, who was born at Fargo, N. Dak. The truck, named after the city in which he was born, is called the Fargo truck.

The Pulitzer prize was awarded to a young chap by the name of Anderson, from Jamestown, N. Dak., for a play written by him.

I remember that in World War I President Wilson searched the entire country for a man who could be depended upon to eliminate corruption and graft in the buying of supplies for the Navy. The President finally selected a young man named John Hancock, from Emerado, N. Dak., a little town with a population of about 100. Mr. Hancock discharged the duties of his office so well that the Congress later delegated to him additional power to buy all the supplies for the Army. Today, in the entire United States, with its population of about 153,000,000, there is but one man who has been decorated by both the Army and the Navy, and that is this man from North Dakota, John M. Hancock.

Again, during the Spanish-American War a larger number of North Dakota boys were decorated for bravery, population considered, than from any other State of the Union. Again, during World War I and following that war, a larger number of North Dakota boys were decorated for bravery, population considered, than from any other State of the Union. Again, in World War II we had the same experience.

During World War I William G. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, who formerly resided in New York, but who later moved to California, when it was found impossible to sell war bonds rapidly enough in the third Liberty Loan drive, offered a prize to the county within any State of the Union which would sell the most Liberty Loan bonds. In competition with over 5,000 other counties in the United States, the little county of Traill, N. Dak., won the prize. The population of that county was about 95 percent Scandinavian, the people having come from Norway and Sweden. The people of that county of Traill, N. Dak., were so patriotic that they led all the counties in the entire United States of America, and Traill County received the prize.

At the end of World War I, when France sent to this country a committee to choose the typical American nurse, that committee visited every State in the Union, and also the District of Columbia. It finally chose a little North Dakota girl, 18 years of age, by the name of Rose Lauder. Today, in the public square in Paris, is a life-size statue of that girl who was chosen by France as the typical American nurse.

We all remember that when Franklin Delano Roosevelt became President the banks of this country were in a precarious condition. The situation was so bad that the President closed every bank in the Nation. Many said the banks should be nationalized. The persons opposed to nationalization were rallied and went to the President and said, "We want a Comptroller of the Currency who will administer the banks honestly and who will open the banks that should be opened." President Roosevelt looked all over America, and in Grand Forks, N. Dak., he chose J. F. T. O'Connor, whom he named as Comptroller of the Currency. Mr. O'Connor did such a good job that Henry Ford, of the Ford Motor Co., which had $164,000,000 on deposit in the banks of Detroit alone—a motor company which had thousands of unemployed men at that time—said that the job done by Mr. O'Connor was a magnificent one and that no one could have done it better.

So, Mr. President, whether it be in agriculture, whether it be in the sciences, whether it be in medicine, whether it be in the arts, citizens of North Dakota stand at the top. I have named only a very few of the outstanding men and women of that State.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I shall be glad to yield in a moment. There are many, many more, Mr. President.

I have previously taken up this question on the floor of the Senate. I have invited the attention of the Senate to the fact that not one person from the State of North Dakota has been appointed to a position of policy making. I have the highest regard for every State in the Union. I am not criticizing any Senator. I do not blame the distinguished senior Senator from New York or any other Senator for getting whatever appointments they may be able to obtain in the line of policy making, but, in all fairness, North Dakota boys are a part of this country. They are drafted or they enlist in the Army, Navy, and Air Force. Why should not someone, somewhere, in the State of North Dakota, have someone to whom they can go if they have a complaint; someone who knows the actual conditions, not only in North Dakota but in the entire Northwest?

We now come to the judiciary, Mr. President. Never has a man from the State of North Dakota been a member of the Supreme Court. Never has a man from the State of North Dakota been on any appeal court. Believe it or not, Mr. President, North Dakota became a State in 1889. The State is a part of the eighth judicial district. There has been a time when as many as three men from the State of Missouri have been on the circut court, two men from the State of Nebraska, two men from the State of South Dakota, but North Dakota never had a representative on that court.

Someone might possibly say it is due to the fact that there is something wrong with the people of the State of North Dakota. But that is not true, because the record shows that in World War I, and again in World War II, they led the entire Nation in the sale of bonds. In the paper drive in World War II, North Dakota was first. In the steel and iron drive, as it was called, North Dakota was first. Nowhere else are there more Christian persons, population considered. Only a short time ago the Saturday Evening Post published the fact that in 12 townships in North Dakota there were more churches than there are in any other 12 rural townships anywhere in the entire United States.

This fine Christian upbringing, Mr. President, is further proved by the fact that at the end of World War I, when veterans' hospitals were established and boys went to them in order to be taken care of, there were fewer boys, population considered, from North Dakota who went to those hospitals to be treated for venereal diseases than there were from any other State in the Union. That is a great tribute to the fine upbringing by their Christian, God-fearing mothers and fathers of those young men.

Mr. President, it seems to me that every Member of the Senate should be interested in this question. Under our Constitution and the laws no man can be appointed either to the Cabinet or to certain important policy-making positions without the advice and consent of the Senate. I think it is a part of the duty of the Senate to see to it that not only North Dakota, but every other State—Arkansas, Wyoming, South Dakota, Montana, Idaho, and others—is properly represented when appointments are made to policy-making positions.

I now yield to my distinguished friend from New York.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, the Senator from New York may say to his distinguished colleague from North Dakota that the Senator from New York is deeply in sympathy with the position taken by the Senator from North Dakota. The Senator from New York fully recognizes the great merit of the people of North Dakota. At the same time, the Senator from New York desires to point out that New York lays no claim to the nomination of General Harrison. Very likely, in fact, undoubtedly, General Harrison has been selected for the position of Defense Production Administrator because of his preeminence and his outstanding qualifications for that position, and not because he comes from the State of New York. Rather, I would say that he has probably been selected in spite of the fact that he comes from the State of New York.

Therefore, Mr. President, I beg my colleague from North Dakota to be charitable in this instance and to recognize the situation as I have tried to indicate it.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I should like to ask him one question.

Mr. IVES. I do not have the floor. I should like to have it, but I have not been able to obtain it yet.

Mr. LANGER. Knowing the distinguished Senator from New York, I appreciate the comment he has made, and I know he has a great deal of sympathy for North Dakota. I do not know of any other Senator who is more sympathetic than is the Senator from New York.

Mr. IVES. I thank the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. He has told me upon different occasions that he believes that some of the States which have not been represented in years past should be represented.

Mr. IVES. The Senator from New York feels very strongly in that connection.

Mr. LANGER. I appreciate it, and I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I am not going to object to the appointment of this man from New York. The last time I spoke on this subject there were three appointments, every blessed one of which was of a person who came from New York. I was in great hope that the distinguished majority leader, coming from the West, would use his influence with the administration. Certainly the majority leader must have the ear of the President of the United States.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I shall be glad to yield in a moment.

Certainly the distinguished majority leader, coming, as he does, from the western section of the Nation, knows, for example, that in the case of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior a man from the West knows more about the public-land question and more about the building of dams than does a man from the New England States. I wish to make it plain that I am not preaching sectionalism. I want New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and all the other States to get their fair share of appointments, but, honestly, Mr. President, I believe that from 1889 on—it is now in the year 1951, and that is 62 years—in the course of 62 years, qualified men and women could have been found in North Dakota who would have done as good a job as has been done by some of the men and women who have been appointed.

For example, Columbia University is located in New York. It is only a few years ago that Columbia University, in its great school of medicine, looked around for a man to head the dental department. The university wanted the very best dentist in the whole world. It did not care about what it would have to pay in order to get the best man. Of course, Mr. President, I do not know how the university happened to pass over my distinguished friend from Wyoming [Mr. HUNT]. However, it came to the State of North Dakota, to the little town of Larimore, a town of 1,200 people, and picked out Arthur Rowe. It came all the way to the little town of Larimore, N. Dak., to pick him to head the great Dental School of Columbia University.

I desire to make it clear that I am not criticizing any Senator on the floor, but I hope very much that Senators who come from Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and the other States, from which so many appointments have been made, will be sympathetic.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield to my good friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I do not like the use of the word "sympathy." I think the Senator from North Dakota is presenting his case in a very strong light. I should like to ask the Senator one question. Did not the Senator himself go to Columbia University in New York for a good legal education, and did he not at the time find the very lovely lady, then a resident of the State of New York, who has since then been his fine wife and good mother to his three daughters?

Mr. LANGER. I may say to my good friend from Massachusetts that before I went to Columbia University I went to the University of North Dakota. After I had finished my studies at the University of North Dakota I went to Columbia University for more college and postgraduate work. Certain subjects were taught at Columbia which were not taught at the University of North Dakota. Naturally, when I got to New York I was of an age when I was attracted by some very fine girls. However, I want to make it clear that at the time I met the lovely young lady who became Mrs. Langer I did not know from what State she came. The truth of the matter is that I met her when I was attending a philharmonic concert one evening at Earl Hall. While I was at the concert a friend of mine, Robert Erskine, walked into the concert with a very, very beautiful young lady. They took their seats in the sixth row, four seats in from the aisle. I arranged to send a fake telephone call to the rear of the concert hall and had Mr. Erskine paged. When Mr. Erskine left his seat, I went down and sat in his place. The young lady said, "I beg your pardon, but there must be some mistake." I liked the tone of her voice. I liked the way she acted. When she said, "This seat belongs to Mr. Erskine," I said she was mistaken and that the seat belonged to me. I kept possession of the seat. So I met the young lady and I made up my mind immediately, the first time I saw her, that if she would have me I would marry her. I did not know whether she came from New York, New Jersey, or any other State. I want to say to my good friend from Massachusetts that if all the girls in his State are as lovely as Mrs. Langer I do not blame anyone for getting married to those very, very fine young ladies.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LANGER. I yield to my good friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I assure the Senator from North Dakota that we have very lovely ladies in Massachusetts, but I also assure him that I still think his decision to pick a resident of the State of New York was an excellent one, and I am sure he feels the same way.

Mr. LANGER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. And I know that the President also has picked some very good men from New York.

Mr. LANGER. Herbert Hoover picked a girl from North Dakota to be his wife. Miss Henry came from Wahpeton, N. Dak. North Dakota yields to no other State when it comes to the beauty of its women, their intellect and their charm, or their ability to make fine wives, lovely hostesses, and excellent mothers. The nice thing about this country is that in every State we are proud of the fact that American women are at the very top of womanhood in the entire world. During my travels in Europe I never saw any women who could compare with the women of the United States.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield to my good friend from Arizona.

Mr. McFARLAND. I merely wish to comment that, in view of the Senator's statement, there can be no question that he will get all the women's votes in North Dakota. I am in sympathy with what the Senator is saying about appointments, because when he read his list I did not hear the name of Arizona mentioned. However, Mr. Harrison is a very able and capable man. So is Mr. Johnston an able man. My only hope is that perhaps we can persuade them to come to live in Arizona, because that may be the only way we will ever get some of the fine gentlemen who hold high offices in our Government to become residents of my State. Perhaps the Senator could do the same thing.

Mr. LANGER. Let us take Arizona. It is only a few weeks ago that the Ambassador to the Court of St. James's, Mr. Douglas, resigned. He came from Arizona. He lived there for many years. The Ambassador to the Court of St. James's came from Arizona, North Dakota has never had an ambassador to any country. [Laughter.] Indeed, in all these years North Dakota has had only one consul. He was consul to Quebec. We never had any consul appointed to any other country. I appreciate that the Senators on the floor, I will not say "sympathize," but appreciate the great problem North Dakota is facing, and I hope that some day when they are talking to the President—and I say this especially to my good friends on the other side of the aisle—they will put in a good word for the appointment of a citizen of North Dakota to a policy-making position in the Government. With that statement, I will not offer any objection to any of the nominations.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield to my distinguished friend from West Virginia.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, in view of the vials of wrath, floods of criticism and deluges of abuse which are daily and hourly overwhelming Cabinet officers, does it not occur to the eminent Senator from North Dakota that his State's failure to obtain representation in the President's Cabinet may be a blessing in disguise?

Mr. LANGER. No; I do not agree. I do not agree with that thought at all. I think that on the whole the men and women who have been appointed to high positions have done a good job, indeed a great job. As a result of what they have done in helping the various Presidents, we have today the greatest country in the world. I am not criticizing a single Cabinet appointment. All I am asking is that when some appointments are to be made, the President of the United States, with the help, advice, and consent of the Senate, will look over the outstanding men and women of North Dakota and name one of them, even if it is only as consul or ambassador. Perhaps we will not have a citizen of North Dakota appointed to the Cabinet, although we should have had one appointed a long time ago. Nevertheless, we may get some appointments. I am particularly concerned today with some appointments in the Army, Navy, and Air Force, so that when the young men of North Dakota go into the service they can feel that there is someone at the top to whom they can take their problems, someone who is fairly conversant with the situation in their home State.

I thank my distinguished friend from West Virginia.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. The Senator paid a richly deserved, eloquent tribute to the late Judge J. F. T. O'Connor, who made a splendid record as Comptroller of the Currency. Let me record the additional fact that Mr. O'Connor later became the judge of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California.

Mr. LANGER. That is correct.

Mr. NEELY. The duties of that high office Judge O'Connor diligently discharged with imperishable honor to himself and unsurpassable satisfaction to the people of California.

Mr. LANGER. That is correct. I may say to my distinguished friend that the State of North Dakota was unanimous, Democrats and Republicans alike, in support of the appointment of J. F. T. O'Connor to the Supreme Court of the United States. As a matter of fact, the only judicial position he ever held was that of district judge. He was never a member of any appellate court. North Dakota never had anyone on any appellate court in the judiciary of the United States.

To repeat, I have no objection to the pending nomination.

Mr. IVES obtained the floor.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, would the Senator mind letting the nominations on the Executive Calendar be confirmed?

Mr. IVES. Certainly not, if it may be understood that the Senator from New York can retrieve the floor following confirmation of the nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I merely wished to complete consideration of the nominations on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. IVES. In the circumstances stated by the Senator from New York, that is, that he may retrieve the floor following the confirmation of the nominations, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of William H. Harrison to be Defense Production Administrator?

The nomination was confirmed.

ECONOMIC STABILIZATION ADMINISTRATOR

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Eric A. Johnston to be Economic Stabilization Administrator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Edgar P. Caffrey to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Nevada.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Public Health Service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations in the Public Health Service are confirmed en bloc.

Without objection, the President will be immediately notified of all nominations confirmed this day.

ASSIGNMENT OF GROUND TROOPS FOR SERVICE IN EUROPE

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I should like to make a very brief statement concerning the resolution which has been submitted by the distinguished junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] and which earlier today was referred by unanimous consent to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and the Senate Committee on Armed Services.

If the purpose of the junior Senator from Nebraska in offering this resolution is to state that, barring attack by Soviet Russia itself, it is the sense of the Senate that, without consultation with and the approval of the Congress, the President should neither assign nor make a commitment to assign in the future any of the Armed Forces of the United States to duty in the European area under the terms of the North Atlantic treaty, then I might agree with him.

But this resolution would seem to call for a procedure of quite a different nature. Without imputing to its introducer other than the highest motives, I am constrained to observe that this resolution, in its effect, might tend to straitjacket and hamstring both the President and the Congress. This situation could arise through failure of the Congress to make adequate appropriations for defense during a period of protracted debate over "the adoption of a policy" as required by the resolution.

The resolution would seem to have the effect of freezing indefinitely into immobility the Armed Forces of the United States, insofar as their use in Europe is concerned.

I fear that a condition thus produced might be a serious handicap to effective American strategy and most dangerous to American defense. In this connection I quote from an editorial entitled "Congress and the President" appearing in the January 20 issue of the New York Herald Tribune:

Any decision made by Congress at this time must be flexible. The swift changes of war and foreign affairs do not permit a military policy to be fixed in advance, in all its details. Certainly the armed services should not be bound, in the event of the outbreak of war, to any firm prescription as to what forces should be employed where. Congress can and should weigh the military evidence and approve a basic plan. But it cannot put its approval in the form of a strait-jacket, binding on the administration under any and all conditions. History is studded with military disasters invited by rigid programs that did not allow for unexpected events.

At this point in my remarks, I ask to have the full text of the editorial inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS AND THE PRESIDENT

The prospects for agreement between the President and Congress over the use of American ground troops in the defense of Western Europe have been greatly improved within recent days. Both Mr. Truman and his congressional critics are shying away from the more extreme assertions of their respective prerogatives and seem inclined to get down to the real question of the day: How can the Atlantic community be made secure?

To be sure, the President made his concessions to Congress in the form of an unfair and incorrect attack upon the reporting of his press conference. Mr. TAFT, receding from his earlier position that no more American ground forces should now be sent to Europe, still insists that any reinforcements should be specifically limited by Congress. Thus there is room for argument over the degree to which the President and the Legislature have actually approached one another, and opportunity for ample discussion as to just how the final formula for congressional approval of a commitment to aid in the land defenses of Europe should be worded.

To this newspaper, the number of American divisions which could safely be dispatched to the Continent—taking into account the resources of the United States and of its allies, the objectives to be attained in Europe, and the capabilities of Russia and her satellites—has seemed primarily a military estimate, to be based on the advice of men whose experience and information permit them to speak with authority. The report of General Eisenhower, therefore, will be crucial on this point. If American and European contributions are to be apportioned in terms of some ratio—one to six, one to four, or whatever—the vital consideration is whether the total force can do the job, and that cannot be determined by spinning theories or juggling figures. It must be based on hard military facts which General Eisenhower has at his disposal.

A corollary to this truth is that any decision made by Congress at this time must be flexible. The swift changes of war and foreign affairs do not permit a military policy to be fixed in advance in all its details. Certainly the armed services should not be bound, in the event of the outbreak of war, to any firm prescription as to what forces should be employed where. Congress can and should weigh the military evidence and approve a basic plan. But it cannot put its approval in the form of a strait-jacket, binding on the administration under any and all conditions. History is studded with military disasters invited by rigid programs that did not allow for unexpected events.

Mr. IVES. Furthermore, because the resolution applies only to ground forces and ignores entirely the Navy and the Air Force, it would seem to raise considerable doubt as to the propriety of the procedure it prescribes.

As I have indicated, I believe that, regardless of constitutional or legal interpretations and as a matter of common sense and sound expediency, the President should consult with and obtain the approval of the Congress with regard to any commitment of American Armed Forces to the European area—and before such commitment is made or additional armed forces are sent. By this process he will insure for himself not only the cooperation of the Congress, but the substantial support of the American people, in any eventuality which may ensue.

Even so, I doubt the wisdom of having the Congress take at this time more than very general action of the kind I have described prior to the report and recommendations which are expected to be made in the relatively near future by General Eisenhower, in whom the American people have great confidence.

The requirements of the resolution proposed by the junior Senator from Nebraska would appear to go far beyond the action I suggest. Therefore, I am opposed to it in its present form or in any form of similar design.

RESOLUTIONS RELATING TO COMMUNIST CHINA

Mr. McCLELLAN obtained the floor.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. I understand that the Senator desires to call up some resolutions which he has heretofore submitted. I wonder if he will yield for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes, Mr. President. It is my purpose to call up three Senate resolutions which I submitted a week ago today, namely, Senate Resolutions 35, 36, and 37, and ask for their consideration. If I may retain the floor following the quorum call, I shall be glad to yield for that purpose.

I may say to the able majority leader that I was not trying to take advantage of the small attendance at the moment. I should like to have every Member of the Senate present. I think these resolutions are important. At least they have considerable significance in expressing the views and judgment of this body. I should like to have every Member present. If I may retain the floor following the quorum call, I shall be glad to yield for the purpose of a quorum call.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield for a question?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Is it the Senator's intention to take the three resolutions from the table and make a motion concerning them or ask for Senate action on them?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I shall bring up the resolutions in the order I have indicated, and ask for their immediate consideration. They cannot be considered en bloc. They will have to be considered one at a time.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. I wish to say to the distinguished acting minority leader, the Senator from Massachusetts, that I told the Senator from Arkansas I would have no objection to the first two resolutions being taken up and considered by the Senate. I said that I thought the third resolution ought to be referred to an appropriate committee. I shall so move after the first two resolutions have been disposed of.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Then it is the intention of the Senator from Arkansas to ask the Senate to vote on the first two resolutions without reference of them to committee?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that that is my intention.

Mr. McFARLAND. I do not think there will be any objection as to the first two, so I shall make no motion for reference as to them, but I shall move that the third resolution be referred to committee.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum is present.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, on January 16, 1 week ago today, I offered three Senate resolutions, which at my request were ordered to lie on the table. They were Senate Resolutions 35, 36, and 37, which were printed in the RECORD of January 16, at page 346. It is my purpose at this time, after discussing the resolutions briefly, to ask unanimous consent for their immediate consideration.

The resolution—Senate Resolution 35—simply declares—

That it is the sense of the Senate that the United Nations should immediately declare Communist China an aggressor in Korea.

At the time I offered the resolutions, I discussed them briefly, setting forth my reason for believing that the Senate should take this action. That was last Tuesday. I did not at that time press for immediate consideration of the resolutions, because of other business then before the Senate. But I had in mind then that, as soon as the pending business was disposed of—and it has now been disposed of—I would request the Senate to act upon these resolutions.

In the meantime, there have been two developments in regard to the first of the resolutions, Senate Resolution 35. Last Friday, the House of Representatives adopted a similar resolution. In fact, the substance of the resolution adopted by the House and its force and effect are identical with this resolution—Senate Resolution 35—which I had previously offered in the Senate. When the resolution was offered in the House, the House acted on it immediately, declaring it to be the sense of the House of Representatives that the Communist Government of China should be declared an aggressor in Korea. The vote in the House on that resolution is not recorded, so it is impossible to know the exact extent of the opposition to it. However, a motion was made in the House to refer the resolution to committee, rather than to take immediate action on it; which is the normal course of procedure. On the motion to refer the resolution, a standing vote was taken, which resulted in 30 yeas, 161 nays. That is some indication of the overwhelming sentiment in the House for the resolution which it adopted.

I am very happy that the House took that action. I think it very appropriate that both Houses of the Congress should take such action. In view of the fact that the House has acted, it certainly behooves the Senate of the United States, the body which has the responsibility for the ratification of treaties dealing with international relations and international affairs, to take similar action.

In the meantime, there has been another development. Since this resolution was offered by me in the Senate I understand that a resolution has been presented in the United Nations by our delegate calling for such action by the United Nations. Since it is apparently the sentiment and will of this Government that such action be taken, I think we can do no less, and should do no less, than to place the Senate of the United States on record as expressing this sentiment, in order that it may fortify our representatives in the United Nations and our delegates there who are now pressing the United Nations to take the action which this resolution says it is the sense of the Senate the UN should take.

Mr. President, I shall not take the time to read it, but there appeared in yesterday's Washington Star an editorial entitled "The House to the UN." I should like to have that editorial printed in the body of the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks. It is a forceful editorial, setting forth the strong sentiments I feel with reference to this resolution and the reasons why the Senate should take action.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE HOUSE TO THE UN

The House of Representatives has taken an unusual and highly significant step in calling upon the United Nations to stop dilly-dallying and brand Red China as an aggressor in Korea. In effect, although the Senate is not expected to act similarly, this throws powerful congressional weight behind the proposal now being pressed by our American delegation in the world organization. Of course, the UN's wavering non-Communist members—particularly the Arab-Asian bloc, which still seems eager for a Munich-like appeasement deal—may not be influenced by the development, but they would be well advised not to underestimate its importance as a measure of public opinion in this country.

For the House resolution—adopted by a virtually unanimous voice vote—undoubtedly reflects the sentiment of the overwhelming majority of the American people. That sentiment draws its fire and strength from two basic facts. The first fact—a fact that naturally stirs this Nation's emotions most deeply—is that the great bulk of the UN's forces in Korea is made up of young men who have left the farms and cities of the United States to fight and die for high purposes in a far-away corner of the globe. And the second fact is this: That the Chinese Communists, by criminally intervening in the situation, have grievously intensified the fighting and dying and have demonstrated—especially in their contemptuous rejection of repeated cease-fire proposals—that they are firmly committed to a black policy of aggression and open warfare against the United Nations.

In such circumstances, how can one justify failure to brand Red China as an aggressor? If 53 members of the UN voted—as they did—to put that label on the North Korean Communists after the latter struck southward across the thirty-eighth parallel last June, why should not the same label now be put on Peiping? The North Korean armed forces had been all but destroyed, their crime had been thoroughly punished and brought to a practical end, when the Mao Tse-tung regime intervened in November to prevent the establishment of peace and the rule of law. On what basis, therefore, can any country argue that that regime is not guilty of aggression? If it is not guilty, then why were the Kremlin's North Korean puppets ever adjudged guilty? And why were freemen sent over there to shed their blood for high purposes? Has it all been in vain? Have the high purposes ceased being high, have they become less real, have they been nullified or wiped out, simply because the original criminal has been replaced by a bigger criminal with greater power to mock and upend those purposes?

These are some of the questions that the American people are now asking themselves. They are what account for the House resolution. The real significance of that resolution is that it challenges the United Nations to act in keeping with the main body of public opinion in this country—an opinion founded on the commonsense proposition that no amount of diplomatic subtlety or Machiavellian maneuvering can obscure the flagrant fact that the Chinese Communists are aggressors in Korea, that they are killing men who have been sent into battle to uphold the rule of law in the world, and that they ought therefore to be labeled for what they really are. To say that this is not so, or to be afraid to say it, or to talk around it as if it were doubtful, does as much violence to what we regard as reality as to argue that the earth may not be round or that two plus two do not necessarily make four.

In short, the waverers and the faint of heart in the United Nations should look very carefully at the House resolution and realize that it speaks for the American people—an aroused people, a people accustomed to calling a spade a spade, a people who want forthrightness in this situation and who will certainly be hard put to retain their faith in the UN if it fails to stand firm against Red China. The honor and integrity of the world organization are at stake here. It cannot yield to fear or unprincipled expediency without risking the danger of an inglorious disintegration.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I shall be happy to yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to ask a question for the information of the Senate. Will the distinguished Senator from Arkansas ask for action on Resolution 37 this afternoon?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes; it is my purpose to ask for action on all three of the resolutions. That is my purpose. Of course, I cannot assure the Senator what action will be taken.

Mr. WHERRY. Several Senators have asked whether the three resolutions would come up this afternoon.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. As to the first two resolutions I have no objection to the Senate's considering them; but as to the third resolution, I think it should be referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. So that there will be a vote or a unanimous-consent agreement as to Resolutions 35 and 36?

Mr. McCLELLAN. The Senator from Arkansas will not move that Resolution 37 be referred to a committee. In all fairness, I think there is no justification for sending either Senate Resolution 35 or Senate Resolution 36 to a committee. We either believe in them or we do not. They simply set forth the judgment of this body.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the able Senator from Arkansas. I know the Senate is interested in all of the resolutions.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I may say to the minority leader that Resolutions 35 and 36 primarily deal with political questions, whereas, in Resolution 37, there are both military and political decisions involved. I shall not seriously oppose it if it is the sentiment of this body to refer Senate Resolution 37 to the appropriate committee.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator had just concluded his statement with reference to Senate Resolution 35, and I understood he was about to take up Senate Resolution 36.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thought that for the purpose of expediting the matter, while I had the floor, I would discuss all three resolutions briefly, and then move to take them up in order.

Mr. WHERRY. With reference to Senate Resolution 35, if the United Nations should act favorably upon it, what action would be taken under articles 41 and 42 that are not now being used in Asia?

Mr. McCLELLAN. In order to have the United Nations employ means to support its peace efforts, if we wish to use those terms, the further action it should take is contained in Senate Resolution 37. In my own judgment, I think we should not fight this war by halfway methods. We should not permit our boys to be dying and fighting against overwhelming odds while the United Nations twiddles its thumbs with reference to using weapons of economic sanctions and blockades. If we are going to fight this war, I think it should be fought with all we have. If we are not going to do that, we should take our boys out of Korea.

Mr. WHERRY. I included in my question the thought that if the United Nations should affirmatively approve the suggestion which is now being made by the Congress that it is the sense of the Congress that the United Nations declare Red China and the Communist Chinese to be aggressors, it would bring into operation article 42 which provides certain measures which could be taken but which are not now being taken.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Declaring Red China to be an aggressor is a preliminary step and a prerequisite before the next steps, which are proposed in Senate Resolutions 36 and 37, are taken.

Mr. WHERRY. If Resolutions 36 and 37 are adopted, then all measures would be taken.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Then the United Nations would take all measures within its power, as I interpret the UN Charter.

Mr. President, I need not dwell longer upon the necessity and the wisdom of this body going on record as favoring the United Nations declaring Red China an aggressor. That, as I have said, is a step, a prerequisite to the invoking of economic sanctions. I think it is a step, Mr. President, that is prerequisite before the Senate should express itself as opposing the admission of China to the United Nations. Therefore I am presenting these resolutions in the order of their relative importance and necessity for action.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I shall be happy to yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. If Resolution 35 should be adopted, the next step is the imposition by the United Nations of economic sanctions and possibly blockades and demonstrations in the air, on the land, and on the sea.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is correct. I will say to the able minority leader that I would not expect the United Nations to impose sanctions and blockades against a nation which is not an aggressor. The first step is to declare it to be an aggressor.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. BRIDGES. First, I should like to compliment the distinguished Senator from Arkansas for offering and pushing these resolutions. I think he is to be commended, and I should be surprised if the resolutions do not receive the unanimous support of the Senate. I want to assure the Senator of my most ardent support.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the able Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. President, regarding Resolution 36, I pointed out in my remarks at the time I presented the resolutions that in order for any government to be admitted as a member of the United Nations, in order for it to be eligible, that government must, under the terms of the Charter, be a peace-loving state. It is wholly inconsistent that any nation could be an aggressor or that any nation could be at war with United Nations forces and be, at the same time, a peace-loving state. Therefore, Mr. President, so long as the Communist government of China is making war against United Nations forces—I would say, at any time they are making war against United States forces alone—I think the Senate and the Government of the United States should oppose its being admitted into membership in the United Nations. It is either an aggressor, a warring nation, in this conflict, or it is a peace-loving nation. If it is a peace-loving nation, it is entitled to membership. If it is not a peace-loving nation, it is not entitled to or eligible for membership in the United Nations. The Government of the United States could never look the American people in the face without blushing with shame if it ever tolerated the admission into the United Nations of a Red Communist government that is on the warpath, murdering American soldiers, killing our own sons, Mr. President, and defying at this hour and at this very moment the authority and the collective effort of the United Nations to restore peace and order in Korea.

Yes, Mr. President, we declared North Korea to be an aggressor. The United Nations treated North Korea as an aggressor. Otherwise there would have been no justification for the President to send American troops to Korea without a directive from Congress. He sent them there in response to a directive of the United Nations. He sent them there to restore peace and to repel the aggressor who had invaded South Korea. Mr. President, South Korea was set up under the supervision of the United Nations and under its trusteeship. If the North Koreans were aggressors and if that fact justified the action we took against them, how can we set back and take no action, be afraid to speak out, be afraid to be resolute, and be afraid to take an affirmative stand against the second aggressor, who is much larger, much more dangerous, and except for whom the conflict in Korea would now be over?

Mr. President, we have done a great deal of talking. I am not criticizing anyone. We should talk and think before we act. However, the time has come for us in the United States Senate, who have a major responsibility in the foreign affairs of our Nation, and who represent every soldier on the battlefield, to quit talking just as individual Senators on the floor and take action by recording our judgment and decision. We should let our judgment and decision stand for and support the high purposes for which we claim we are fighting today in Korea. If—I say if—the United Nations in this test, in this crucial test, will not respond and maintain the high purposes for which it was created in the cause of peace, if it has become so timid or has so deteriorated that it lacks courage to declare a big aggressor to be an aggressor, as it declared a little aggressor to be an aggressor, it is time for us to begin to wonder—and the American people are wondering—what we have gotten into in the United Nations. The time has come for some definite and affirmative action.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I join with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] in commending the Senator from Arkansas for bringing the subject to the attention of the Senate. I fully support him in his desire to bring up Resolution 35 and Resolution 36 for action by the Senate at this time. However, I agree with the majority leader that insofar as Resolution 37 is concerned, it would be more orderly procedure for it to go to the proper committee of the Senate. Insofar as the first two resolutions are concerned, I fully endorse what the Senator from Arkansas has said and assure him of my support in getting action by the Senate.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. For the RECORD, because it was not published in the newspapers today—or at least I could not find it—I asked for a break-down of the vote in the United Nations yesterday. The vote was 27 to 23 in favor of further delay and procrastination in meeting the present issue in Korea. As the Senator has ably pointed out, for a period of more than two and a half months the Chinese Communist forces have been clearly identified as being in conflict with United Nations forces in Korea, and have become aggressors by crossing the international frontier at the Yalu River. They are in Korea in force as aggressors.

I fully agree with the Senator from Arkansas that for the United Nations to stultify itself by trembling in its boots and failing to declare the Communist Chinese aggressors, after having declared the North Koreans aggressors for crossing the thirty-eighth parallel, is to subscribe to the doctrine that right makes might and that if one is a big enough aggressor, or a successful enough aggressor, he is welcomed into the family of nations, and the United Nations is ready to shake his bloody hand.

Because a roll call was not published in the newspapers, I called the State Department and asked for a breakdown of the vote yesterday. I thought the Senator would be interested in having it inserted in the RECORD at this point.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am very glad to have it inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Against postponement were the United States of America, Turkey, Greece, and the Latin American countries. I do not have a full breakdown of the Latin-American countries, but I shall insert it in the RECORD as soon as I have obtained it.

Abstaining were Australia, Belgium, and Lebanon.

For postponement and delay in declaring the Chinese Communists the aggressor they are, and who have continued over a considerable period of time in the past to obstruct the United Nations from taking any action against them were the United Kingdom, Canada, France, Israel, Yugoslavia, Norway, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Byelorussia, the Ukraine, and the Arab States.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I appreciate very much the Senator's contribution, and I am very glad to have the insertion made in the RECORD at this time.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I shall yield in a moment. Among the nations who voted in opposition to our desire to take up the resolution declaring the Chinese Communists aggressors are a number who ought to be supporting us and should be with us, in view of the protection and aid we have given them. Furthermore, some of them are charter members of the UN.

Mr. President, the time has come for members of the United Nations to place themselves on one side or the other on this issue. They should not longer dilly-dally, but should support the United Nations forces who are fighting the aggressor.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Does not the Senator from Arkansas agree with me that the members of the United Nations who have taken two and a half months to recognize a clear-cut case of aggression in Korea are setting a very dangerous precedent, because if the United States and the free nations of the world who have contributed to resisting aggression in Korea should take two and a half months to make up their minds if aggression should come in Europe or elsewhere, most of them would be overrun and be behind the iron curtain, and their political leaders would be liquidated or in the salt mines of Siberia, if we and the rest of the free world should wait as long as they have waited to call Communist China the aggressor that she is?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am in substantial agreement with the statement of the able Senator from California. My position is simply this: As a result of the lack of action and the conduct of the United Nations, as it has developed during the past few months, and the indecision, inaction, quibbling, and lack of courage seemingly present in the United Nations, it is becoming weaker and weaker, and the American people, who had such high hopes for its purposes and its ultimate success, are speedily losing confidence in it. They are losing confidence not only in its ability to do anything, but in its lack of will and purpose to meet its responsibilities. I am glad to yield now to the able Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I am happy to rise to identify myself with the distinguished Senator from Arkansas and the other Members of this body who have expressed approval of the resolutions which he has offered.

I wish merely to make one further observation. I am one of those who from the very beginning have supported the idea and purposes of the United Nations. I have shared in the hopes which we entertained with respect to that organization. We feel completely frustrated in regard to the whole matter, and the delay in recognizing what is an obvious fact to everyone else in the world—a delay in fear of a great nation which is aggressing, when the United Nations already has recognized aggression by a smaller nation.

So I commend the Senator from Arkansas for bringing this subject to the attention of the Senate and the attention of the people of the United States and the people of the world. We feel that it is time for the United Nations to screw up its courage, stand together, and recognize an obvious aggression which is threatening the peace of the world. It should continue to resist it until it is dealt with forcibly.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the Senator from New Jersey, and I appreciate his contribution to this discussion. I wish to hurry along. Before I pass to Senate Resolution 37, let me say that in my remarks when I submitted these resolutions a few days ago I stated that the day that Communist China is admitted to membership in the United Nations the United States should walk out. I wish to repeat that statement.

Further, if the work of the United Nations during the past few months is an indication of what can be expected of it in the future, if it is to continue approaching these issues timidly, without courage, without squaring its actions with the facts and realities, there is not much hope, not much that we can look forward to by continuing our membership in such an organization.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. KEM. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas if he does not think it is a rather significant fact that the countries which have been the principal beneficiaries of the gifts of the United States under the Marshall plan are among the list of countries opposing the position of the United States on this issue, as we have just been informed by the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND]?

Mr. McCLELLAN. It is a great disappointment to me that they are not today giving their support to us.

Having immediately declared North Korea an aggressor, and having acquiesced in and supported the directive issued by the United Nations calling upon all members of the United Nations to offer resistance to it, it amounts to an act of cowardice if they refuse to declare Communist China to be an aggressor.

As I have stated, the House of Representatives has already acted upon a resolution similar to Senate Resolution 35. I hope the Senate will agree to Senate Resolution 35, and also to Senate Resolution 36, which states that it is the sense of this body that Communist China should not be admitted to membership in the United Nations. I hope the House of Representatives will immediately adopt a similar resolution to Senate Resolution 36.

Mr. President, I should like to express my views regarding Senate Resolution 37. I have discussed the resolution with the able chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. There is some feeling on the part of the leadership that this resolution should be referred to a committee.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, would the Senator mind getting a vote on Senate Resolutions 35 and 36 before he goes to Senate Resolution 37?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I shall be through in less than 2 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be necessary to obtain unanimous consent for a vote on these resolutions at this time, because another resolution is still before the Senate.

Mr. McCLELLAN. In a moment I shall ask unanimous consent.

With regards to Senate Resolution 37, I think there is some justification for asking that that resolution be referred to a committee, because, as I stated, it involves not only a political decision, but a military consideration as well. I think it is appropriate that that resolution be referred to a committee, and I shall have no objection when the motion is made.

As to its merits, Mr. President, I wish to quote from an editorial which appeared in yesterday's Washington News. I ask unanimous consent that the entire editorial be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FIGHT TO WIN OR QUIT

General MacArthur says that the American Army fighting in Korea as the agent of the United Nations awaits political decisions from the chancelleries of the world on the problem confronting it.

That problem is the intervention of Red China, dating from October.

"Considering that the entire military might of Communist China is available against this relatively small command (the UN forces)," General MacArthur warns, "only by maneuver may it avoid hazards inherent in the great odds which it now faces."

That is a clear challenge to the gentlemen representing the United Nations at Lake Success to make up their minds what they intend to do. And it must be answered.

The American resolution branding the Reds as aggressors, which has been presented to the UN, makes no provision for sanctions against Red China and carefully avoids anything that might be interpreted as authorizing General MacArthur to strike directly at Peiping's homeland and supply bases. It is from China itself, and the bases there, that the Red forces fighting our troops are being supplied. But our troops have become the forgotten men in this war.

The Defense Department is trying to muzzle Maj. Gen. Emmett O'Donnell, who raised this same issue upon his recent return from Korea.

"We have been fighting distinctly under wraps since the Communists came into the war," General O'Donnell says. "I never thought I'd see the day when we would have to sit back with our hands tied. * * * If we're going to fight, let's not hit 'em light, for heaven's sake. It's time people knew that this is an all-out war."

That is mild to what the boys in the frozen fox holes are saying.

They have been let down. They know it. They want to come home.

They are tired of being shot at like sitting ducks while the United Nations exchanges notes with the outlaw Chinese Government at Peiping.

The State Department seems determined to make General MacArthur the goat in this situation, just as it made former Defense Secretary Johnson the goat for the original debacle in Korea.

But it can't get away with that. The record is too clear.

The fault is not in Korea but in Washington, in London, and at Lake Success.

The weakness of American political leadership was demonstrated when it was unable to persuade any of the other great powers to join us in sponsoring the mild condemnation resolution presented to the UN.

Britain, Canada, and our other fair-weather friends will vote for this resolution on the show-down. But they'll do it with great reluctance. And they are not prepared to support any reprisal measures against the Chinese Reds. Yet this resolution would do nothing more than officially recognize a condition which has been fact for 3 months while ducking the question of what is to be done about it. So the resolution itself is an act of appeasement.

General MacArthur has been gagged and General O'Donnell has been called on the carpet, doubtless to be warned to make no more statements on the outrageous way the policy makers have bungled this whole affair. But the truth will out, despite gags and censorship. The record made at Lake Success is there for all to read.

Our Army in Korea has plenty of fight left in it, according to General Collins, the Army Chief of Staff.

But why should that Army fight when the cause it is supporting has been disowned by the organization it is representing? No effort is being made to reinforce it. Why should more men die on a mission that seems to have been abandoned?

The UN must answer these questions, or it will be faithless to the world which has placed its trust in it, and faithless to the men who have died fighting in its name.

Economic sanctions should be voted against Red China. Its ports should be blockaded. The bases from which it is supplying its outlaw forces should be bombed. Aid should be extended to the guerrilla forces fighting the Reds on the China mainland. The Chinese Nationalists should be encouraged to return to China proper so that the Reds will be forced to fight on two fronts. That is the way to carry on this war if there is any desire to win it.

It cannot be won by the present half-hearted measures.

If the UN doesn't intend to fight to win, then our troops should be pulled out and the whole enterprise abandoned.

If the UN will not face up to this issue, then our own Government must. We should fight to win or quit.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I should like to quote from this editorial, because it expresses my sentiments:

But why should that Army fight when the cause it is supporting has been disowned by the organization it is representing? No effort is being made to reinforce it. Why should more men die on a mission that seems to have been abandoned?

The UN must answer these questions, or it will be faithless to the world which has placed its trust in it, and faithless to the men who have died fighting in its name.

Economic sanctions should be voted against Red China. Its ports should be blockaded.

Korea's ports were blockaded. I wonder why we should not blockade Red China, a much more powerful foe.

The bases from which it is supplying its outlaw forces should be bombed. Aid should be extended to the guerrilla forces fighting the Reds on the China mainland. The Chinese Nationalists should be encouraged to return to China proper so that the Reds will be forced to fight on two fronts. That is the way to carry on this war if there is any desire to win it.

It cannot be won by the present half-hearted measures.

If the UN doesn't intend to fight to win, then our troops should be pulled out and the whole enterprise abandoned.

If the UN will not face up to this issue, then our own Government must. We should fight to win or quit.

Mr. President, those views are in line with the sentiments I expressed in my remarks at the time I introduced this resolution. I believe that that is the action which the United Nations should take.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Resolution 35.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 35) favoring a declaration by the United Nations that Communist China is an aggressor in Korea, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the United Nations should immediately declare Communist China an aggressor in Korea.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none; and, without objection, the resolution is agreed to.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Resolution 36.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 36) opposing the admission of Communist China to membership in the United Nations, was read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that Communist China should not be admitted to membership in the United Nations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I have consulted with Dr. Wilcox, of the staff of the Foreign Relations Committee, with regard to this resolution. I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that China is now a member of the United Nations.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I should like to modify the resolution to say "the Chinese Communist Government."

Mr. McMAHON. That is, the Chinese Communist Government should not be admitted as the representative of China in the United Nations. China is now a member of the United Nations. It is a question of who shall represent China. The Senator's intention is to see that the Communists of China do not hold that position. Is that not true?

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is correct.

Mr. President, I so modify the resolution. I ask unanimous consent, if that is necessary. The modified resolution will then read:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Communist Chinese Government should not be admitted to membership in the United Nations as the representative of China.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an observation?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I would also suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that it might be well that the resolution go to the Foreign Relations Committee. I am as strongly opposed as is the Senator from Arkansas to the Mao Tse-tung crowd being admitted to the United Nations as the representatives of China. I have in mind, however, that the situation may well change in the months to come. It is true that we could by suitable resolution at that time indicate that the situation had, in our opinion, changed. But it seems to me that if Mao Tse-tung were to have a falling out with Stalin and Moscow he would probably be as fair company in the United Nations as at the present time is Tito, who has fallen out with his former master, Mr. Stalin.

I merely want to call the Senate's attention to the fact that while I am firmly against the recognition of the Mao Tse-tung crowd in the United Nations so long as the present situation persists, I still do not think we should bar the door to future representation by them if they so conduct themselves as to bring them into conflict with the Stalin Government, as Tito has now done.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am glad to yield, but I should like first to make a statement. I think the possibilities of the happening of any such thing as that indicated by the able Senator from Connecticut are so remote, so contingent, and so highly improbable, that we should not quibble about these things, but the Senate ought to go on record now. We are talking about present conditions. If Communist China takes a peace-loving stand, if she repents, and we are convinced that she is sincere, there will be plenty of time and opportunity for the Senate to reverse this action, or rather to take appropriate action to indicate its willingness that she should become a member of the United Nations.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Arkansas has taken a very sound stand on this question. Some of those who originally tried to make the American people believe that the Chinese Communists were only agrarian reformers came up with the idea that Mao Tse-tung is a "Tito." The fact is that he is a willing and an enthusiastic ally of the Kremlin. It has been reliably reported that he negotiated an agreement within which this aggression has taken place. He has been working hand in glove with the Kremlin in connection with the Korean situation.

The able Senator from Arkansas has pointed out that in the event conditions change in the future the Senate of the United States can meet the changed situation at that time. But I think it is equally important for the Senate of the United States today and now to go on record as saying that, in the face of the record of Mao Tse-tung and the Communist regime in China, we do not believe they should be admitted to the United Nations.

It is pertinent, because in the discussions which are now proceeding on the part of some of our so-called allies who are showing in the United Nations such a weak-kneed position, one of the bits of appeasement suggested is the seating of the Communist Chinese in the United Nations. I say to the Senator from Arkansas that if that takes place it will destroy the entire moral fabric of the United Nations. Therefore we should have an opportunity to act. Those who do not believe that Mao Tse-tung is a Communist can vote against the resolution. But it seems to me that the Senate of the United States should have an opportunity now to go on record clearly, while the matter is pertinent, that we do not believe that Mao Tse-tung and the Communist regime should be seated in the United Nations.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I do not think any inference ought to be drawn from what the Senator from Connecticut has said that he is under any illusion as to where Mao Tse-tung stands. If I have to call upon an authority I could call upon the Honorable Patrick Hurley, who after a talk with Mr. Stalin in Moscow, when he was there as our Ambassador, stated to the press that while Mao Tse-tung was a Communist he did not think that he had any connections with Stalin directly, and that Stalin was not interested in Mao Tse-tung. I say I could call upon Patrick Hurley as an authority. I could call upon him as a witness to what was not so, because obviously Mao Tse-tung and Stalin have been closer together than two peas in a pod. I have no doubt at all that it would be a tragic mistake to recognize this fellow Mao Tse-tung or any of his crowd, and I said so.

I should like to point out to the Senator, who is so confident of what the future will be, that if any Senator had told us at the time when Tito shot down the American fliers that we would be now looking with careful eyes upon his 30 divisions in Europe, he would have been labeled as unsound in mind.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMAHON. The Senator from Arkansas has the floor. I shall finish my observation in a moment. I say that a situation arising because of the jealousy of the master for the servant, which would result in a gradual widening or split between Mao Tse-tung and Stalin, could mean nothing but good for honest men, because "when thieves fall out, honest men get their due."

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield for a comment at that point?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield for a comment.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I should like to point out to the Senator from Connecticut, insofar as the events in Yugoslavia are concerned, that in the votes in the United Nations since the Korean aggression took place, Yugoslavia has consistently either abstained or voted with the Soviet Union in the United Nations; and on the vote yesterday Yugoslavia was lined up with those nations that were not willing to declare Communist China to be an aggressor.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I join the Senator from California in expressing the strong hope that the Senator from Arkansas will insist upon the immediate consideration of his Senate Resolution 36. I call attention to the fact that the Senate has just by unanimous action adopted the Senator's resolution (S. Res. 35) which was:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the United Nations should immediately declare Communist China an aggressor in Korea.

The Senator from Arkansas well knows and every Senator well knows that the principal purpose for that action was to assure the world, and incidentally our delegation at the United Nations who are now fighting for this very point, that the Senate of the United States does not approve the appeasement which is evidenced in the indecision, the unwillingness, the timidity of certain members of the United Nations to declare Communist China an aggressor. I call to the attention of the distinguished Senator the fact that that same element of abject appeasement runs on beyond the question of declaration of aggression to the more ridiculous suggestion of immediate admission to membership in the United Nations of Communist China. It would seem to the Senator from Florida that the failure to adopt Senate Resolution 36 at this time would indicate that the Senate feels that there is less of appeasement involved in that resolution and on that subject, and that question, than there is in the other question of the declaration of Red China as an aggressor.

It seems to the Senator from Florida that if there is any difference between the two resolutions, the more complete and the more absurd appeasement is involved in the continuing effort of various nations to seat Communist China in the United Nations, when they know perfectly well that to do so would be to seat her at a time when, as an aggressor, she is fighting openly in the field against American soldiers and soldiers from other members of the United Nations, when Communist China has on her hands the blood of American soldiers and soldiers of other members of the United Nations. Still it is proposed by those appeasers that at this time and under these conditions, Red China be admitted to major membership in the United Nations, as one of the great powers, with the veto power in the Security Council.

So the Senator from Florida expresses the very strong hope that the Senator from Arkansas will insist upon the present consideration of Senate Resolution 36, not that he is unmindful of the excellent observations which have been brought into the debate by the Senator from Connecticut, but because he feels that Senators would be left in a position of having left in question and in doubt their position on the second point, as to whether appeasement is or is not involved in it; and it would leave in question what we feel as to how far we should go in backing up our delegation to the United Nations in opposing the seating of Communist China in the United Nations, when we have just unanimously said to them, "We do not want you to fail to declare Red China an aggressor." Now to show indecision or unwillingness to bring to an immediate decision this other question of proposed membership in the United Nations, on the part of Red China, would, it seems to me, leave the Senate in a weak and most unfortunate position, in which I hope the distinguished Senator from Arkansas will not leave the Members of the Senate.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I wish to thank the able Senator from Florida. I may say it would not only leave the Senate now in an awkward position and attitude, but someone might suspect that the Senate was beginning to join the appeasers or that we lacked courage to move forward and see the thing through. I wish to see it through. I wish to see Senate Resolution 37 adopted. When Senate Resolution 36, which we are now considering, is adopted, I, myself, shall move that Senate Resolution 37 be referred to the appropriate committee. I believe there is proper justification for doing that, for the resolution involves considerations or issues in regard to which we should have the benefit of the wisdom of committee deliberation.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President——

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am glad to yield first to the Senator from New York, for I believe he rose first.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I was very happy, indeed, to vote for Senate Resolution 35.

I shall certainly vote for Senate Resolution 36, if the decision is made not to refer the resolution to the Foreign Relations Committee.

I shall oppose with all my strength the seating in the United Nations at this time of representatives of the government of Communist China. I think there may have been a time in the past when it would have been wise to admit representatives of the Communist government of China to the United Nations. I think the time may come again when it may be wise to do so. However, at this time certainly I should oppose the seating of Communist China in the United Nations, because if we took that action we would be taking it with a gun pointed at our heads, and certainly that would be an act of appeasement.

As the able Senator from Connecticut has pointed out, I think we do not know what is going to happen in the future. We do not know what developments there may be in the relationships between the Communist Government of China and Stalin. We do not know other circumstances which may affect our action and our decision in the future.

I think I have made it clear that I am not advocating, of course, the seating of Communist China in the United Nations. I would be opposed to that with all my strength and all my power.

However, certainly, it is not an act of appeasement to refer a resolution of this importance to the Foreign Relations Committee. No one can call the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], or the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], or the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], or the other members of that committee appeasers. I think we should have the benefit of the advice, the scrutiny, and the consultation of the Foreign Relations Committee. Therefore, Mr. President, I very much hope that the distinguished Senator from Arkansas will agree to have that done.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the Senator. Mr. President, I shall not agree to have this particular resolution sent to the committee.

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield for a question.

Mr. FLANDERS. I wish to take 1 minute and one-half.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Very well; I yield.

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, I simply wish to call attention to what seems to me to be a fundamentally ridiculous situation which is proposed when we are asked to refer this resolution to the Foreign Relations Committee. We have already adopted Senate Resolution 35, declaring Communist China to be an aggressor. Now to refer Senate Resolution 36 to a committee would seem to indicate that there might be some doubt about the matter; such action would involve the idea that perhaps Communist China should be admitted to membership in the United Nations, and would also involve the idea that a country which we declare to be an aggressor perhaps ought to be one of the permanent members of the United Nations. That is so ridiculous, Mr. President, that I do not see how for a moment we can consider it.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield. I hope the Senator will be brief, for I should like to conclude.

Mr. FERGUSON. I shall be brief.

Mr. President, I wish to say a few words in regard to the resolution. I am prepared to vote upon it, and I hope the Senate may be permitted to vote upon it at this time. I wish to ask the Senate not to send the resolution to a committee.

I think it is entirely clear that the resolution does not need further study. It has been debated. The issue is well understood.

The time has come when those who represent the United States in the United Nations should know exactly how the Senate of the United States feels and how the people of the United States feel. This resolution is one means by which we can get a positive bipartisan decision upon a very important problem.

The party representation in the Senate today is on the basis of 49 to 47. I venture to say that division will not be apparent in any vote we take at the present time. Therefore, Mr. President, when the Senate speaks—and on this question it should speak immediately—it will speak clearly and authoritatively. It should be permitted to say that Communist China, Soviet China, should not be admitted to membership in the United Nations. It is a clear proposition and we can give it a clear answer.

Mr. President, I think it is highly important that we act immediately, that we give the world our opinion today—not tomorrow or the next day, but today. We should state our conviction that Communist China has forfeited any right to become a member of the family of nations, that it cannot function in the family of nations. The Senate should advise the United States representatives in the United Nations that opinion in the United States today means just that, and expects our representatives to say it immediately in the United Nations.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. BRIDGES. Let me point out to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas that today there is no vacancy in the United Nations. The place referred to is held by the Nationalist Government of China. The method of the approach by which it is sought to seat representatives of the Chinese Communists in the United Nations is wholly a kangaroo-court method.

Mr. President, we should take immediate action on this resolution. Of course I have great respect for the distinguished Senator from New York. However, I, for one, do not need the benefit of the scrutiny or the advice of the Foreign Relations Committee in order to determine how I shall vote on this issue; and I do not think other Members of the Senate do.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I wish to commend the distinguished Senator from Arkansas for his stand upon these two resolutions.

I simply wish to say that what might be misunderstood is not what might be said here on the floor of the Senate, but the reference of this resolution to a committee. That is what might be misunderstood. I think it is time the Senate of the United States should act on conditions as they are today, and that we should take some action in an effort to put a little backbone into the members of the United Nations, so as to get them to stand for what they think is right.

For that reason, when it comes to voting on the resolution, I shall ask for the yeas and nays, in order that all nations may know where we stand upon this question.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the distinguished majority leader

Mr. President, I join in the request for the yeas and nays on the question of agreeing to the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to Senate Resolution 36, as modified, submitted by the Senator from Arkansas.

Those in favor of agreeing to the resolution as modified will vote "yea" when their names are called; and those who are opposed to agreeing to the resolution as modified will vote "nay."

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, is the question on the motion to refer the resolution to the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to Senate Resolution 36 as modified.

Mr. AIKEN. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as modified; is that correct?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; the question is on the adoption of the resolution as modified.

The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] is absent by leave of the Senate, and if present would vote "yea."

I announce also that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK] is absent because of illness, and if present would vote "yea."

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] are absent by leave of the Senate. If present and voting, the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Michigan would each vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 91, nays 0, as follows:

So the resolution (S. Res. 36), as modified was agreed to.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I call up Senate Resolution 37 and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 37), which is as follows:

That it is the sense of the Senate that the United Nations should immediately take such measures against Communist China under chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations as will be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security, including the application by members of the United Nations of measures for the complete interruption of economic relations and of rail, sea, air, postal, telegraphic, radio, and other means of communication, the severance of diplomatic relations, and operations by air, sea, or land forces of members of the United Nations.

Mr. McCLELLAN obtained the floor.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am happy to yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I merely desired to say, that if the Senator from Arkansas does not intend to move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, I so move. Referring the resolution to the committee would not mean that the Senate might not be in favor of it, but the resolution contains matters which should have the careful consideration of a committee before action is taken.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, in the course of my remarks I have stated my willingness that the resolution be referred to the appropriate committee. I have no objection. After giving the question some thought, I am inclined to the view that the resolution should have committee consideration. Therefore, I shall not object to the motion to refer it. I believe the resolution is of so much importance that as prompt action as is possible should be taken with reference to it. We should not keep our boys fighting in this conflict against overwhelming odds, fighting under the banner of the United Nations, if the United Nations fails to take every action within its power to protect and to support the troops who are fighting. If we expect our soldiers to fight with bullets in the face of overwhelming odds, certainly we should call upon the United Nations to fight with every economic weapon at its command and which is available to it. It simply does not make sense that UN members should continue trade and commerce with China, continue to let her have a free rein, and not try to prevent any material from reaching her that would aid her in the war.

The time has come for action, and I earnestly hope that the Foreign Relations Committee will give this resolution immediate consideration, and report it to the Senate in such form as in its wisdom it feels would best carry out its purposes.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. In my opinion the Senator's resolution is an excellent one, and I should be pleased to vote for it on the floor of the Senate if I had the opportunity, but does the Senator agree that a part of our problem in connection with the resolution is the necessity of working out some understanding with some of our allies within the United Nations, and particularly Great Britain, which has already recognized Red China, and which continues to trade with Red China, and continues to let a condition exist which results in the killing of American boys, while much war material which Great Britain has is getting to Red China through Hong Kong? Does not the Senator agree that inherent in his resolution is the problem of coming to terms with Great Britain in determining whether she is on our side or on the side of Red China?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I fully agree with the able Senator from Oregon. I stated at the time I presented the resolution that the time had come to compel a decision, and to determine whether we are going to fight a war and have United Nations membership in support of it, or whether we are going to fight a limited war and permit trade as usual with aggressor nations. I said earlier this afternoon that there are military considerations in the resolution, and for that reason I feel that our military should also be consulted.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Like the Senator from Oregon, I wish I had an opportunity to vote for the resolution today. I have noted that the United Nations, and sometimes the Congress of the United States, adopt resolutions. Does not the Senator from Arkansas agree with me that besides adopting resolutions, such a recourse as is suggested by General O'Donnell would be rather effective in bringing about the condition which this resolution seeks to effectuate?

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is probably true. I expressed my views very emphatically when I presented this resolution, to the effect that we should fight an all-out war or should bring our boys home. It is not consistent with sound policy, and it is not humane, to keep our boys fighting with one hand tied behind their backs. I believe they should be doing all-out fighting or should come home.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I feel that the resolution which is now before the Senate should have been made part and parcel of Senate Resolution 35. We have recorded our opinion that the time has come to advise our representatives in the United Nations that Communist China should be branded an aggressor. The matter by no means should rest there. The Charter of the United Nations provides certain actions to be taken against it as an aggressor. If we are determined Red China is an aggressor, as we are so determined, we should also press to invoke the steps specified to be taken against an aggressor.

I hope we will not permit the world to misunderstand the meaning of our action on Senate Resolution 35 by referring this resolution to a committee at this time. The boys in Korea today know beyond any doubt that Soviet China is an aggressor. It has violated every precept of peace and it is at actual war under any definition of war. It is therefore altogether fitting and proper it should be declared an aggressor. But any such statement is reduced to a pious declaration if it is not to be followed through and made truly meaningful. Having declared Red China an aggressor, action should also be taken by the United Nations calling upon all nations to take appropriate steps to stop the aggression as specified in the Charter, and we should now declare that to be the sense of the Senate.

I think the time has come when the United Nations, after voting that a country is an aggressor, must take immediate action. I feel very certain in my mind that if proper action had been taken by the 53 nations on the first and second resolutions, with respect to the aggression by North Korea, Communist China would not be in the war today. The Communists would have known, not only by vote of the United Nations, but by action, that aggression could not continue.

I am sorry we cannot vote on the resolution of the Senator from Arkansas now. I think the time has come when we must be certain in our votes. We must be certain in our deeds to carry out our votes. We must be certain that we advise the United Nations that America will say what it means, and will mean what it says, and will not merely vote resolutions with no intention of carrying them out, or be lukewarm about carrying them out. If we take action today, we can stop aggression.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. MALONE. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Arkansas if he understands, as I understand, that the committee of the United Nations which is handling affairs so far as our Army in Korea is concerned, and which is negotiating with the Chinese Communists, is made up of personnel the majority of whose nations have recognized Communist China? India has recognized the Communist Chinese regime. Canada's mother country has recognized the Communist regime. Is the Senator from Arkansas aware of that fact?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Is the Senator from Nevada speaking of a committee of the United Nations?

Mr. MALONE. I am speaking of the committee which is handling the negotiations between the United Nations and Communist China. In other words, our Army is at the mercy of the committee, in having to wait for action from a committee which is made up of a majority of nations who have recognized Communist China. Does the Senator from Arkansas understand that to be the situation?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I do not know that I fully understand that to be the situation. It may be true that a majority of the members of the United Nations have recognized Communist China.

Mr. MALONE. No. I mean the three-man committee which is handling the negotiations between the United Nations and Communist China in the matter of stopping the war in Korea. In other words, the three-man committee is made up of representatives of India, Canada, and Iran.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Are they all representatives of governments which have recognized Red China, or are two of them?

Mr. MALONE. Two of them, or a majority of the committee.

Mr. McCLELLAN. A majority; yes.

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas whether or not it is a self-appointed committee?

Mr. MALONE. I should like to have an answer to my question.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The Senator's understanding may be correct. I am not advised.

Mr. MALONE. It is a fact. I refer to the Cease-Fire Committee which is negotiating for the United Nations.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I do not know what the status of the committee is.

Mr. MALONE. I do not know what the status of it is, but a majority of the committee represents countries which have recognized Communist China. They are the ones who are negotiating, in effect, for our Army now fighting in Korea against the Communist forces.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. MALONE. It is a fact, is it not, that the nations of Europe have at least 100 trade treaties with Russia and other eastern iron-curtain countries under which the European countries are shipping to the iron curtain countries almost everything they need to consolidate their gains in Eastern Europe and in China, and are furnishing matériel—tool steel, locomotives, and so forth—which they need to fight a war?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I know the number of such treaties is large. I cannot say how many.

Mr. MALONE. There are 96 such treaties. I put a list of them in the RECORD last year. Does the Senator from Arkansas understand that both England and France have independent economic and military pacts with Russia, which are in good standing, and that they have never been questioned?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I understand that to be the fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. McFARLAND] to refer Senate Resolution 37 to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the body of the RECORD at this point a part of an address which I delivered on January 15 before the Ohio Society of New York.

There being no objection, the portion of the address referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The election in Ohio also showed a substantial lack of confidence in the conduct of foreign policy by the present Administration. Since the election it has been claimed that this lack of confidence played no part in the result. But certainly no voter had any doubt that I was opposed to the administration's foreign policy up to that moment. In every county in Ohio, I pointed out that the present threat of Russian aggression upon which our whole present national danger is based was brought about by the secret agreements of Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam, and by our course since that time in the Far East. I pointed out that at Yalta and Potsdam, we set Russia up in a powerful position in central Europe, in Berlin, and Eastern Germany, in Prague and Czechoslovakia, in Vienna and eastern Austria, from which they dominate central Europe and threaten the safety of Western Europe and of the United States. I pointed out that these agreements had handed over Manchuria to Russia in violation of the open-door policy upon which our whole eastern policy had been based for 50 years. I pointed out that this agreement had been made without even telling Chiang Kai-shek, who had been our ally for 5 years, until months after it had been made. I pointed out that this had led to the arming of the Chinese Communists by Russia and the constant promotion of their cause, while we welcomed the Chinese Communists as agrarian reformers entitled to American support. I pointed out that General Marshall had insisted that Chiang take Communists into his cabinet and, when this fatal course was refused, cut off all arms from the Nationalist armies at the most crucial time. I pointed out that we failed to arm the South Koreans, although we said we would do so, giving them only small arms against tanks, planes, and heavy artillery furnished to North Korea by the Russians.

A war in Korea was morally justified as an international move against aggression. But the President undertook it without legal authority and in direct violation of the statute which specified that Congress must pass on the troops to be furnished the United Nations under the Charter.

The war in Korea has revealed the inherent weakness of the United Nations which I have pointed out from the beginning, and made it clear that because of the veto we cannot possibly rely on the United Nations as a weapon against Russian aggression. While it may still be a diplomatic weapon, we would only repeat the disaster resulting from the aggression of the Chinese Communists if we relied upon it in determining our military policy.

Since we can no longer rely upon the United Nations, it is obvious that we cannot for some years hope to resist Chinese aggression in Korea, and it seems to me that we should retire as we have already retired from Hungnam.

Instead of that, we are now contemplating the most complete appeasement since Munich. The acceptance by our confused State Department of the UN cease-fire plan is another tragic error in our far-eastern policy. We obtain nothing except the right to make a withdrawal, which we apparently could make ourselves if we decided to do so. Paragraph 3 of the plan provides that all non-Korean armed forces will be withdrawn by appropriate stages from Korea. In other words, we sneak away from Korea, leaving the Korean Communists in full control, by the gracious leave of the Communists. At the same time we agree to sit down with the British, the Russians, and the Chinese Communists to discuss the admission of Communist China into the United Nations, and also the disposition of Formosa.

To admit that an outrageous aggression such as that of the Chinese Communists can be the basis for admission into the United Nations is not only an abject acceptance of American defeat, but it destroys the whole moral basis of the United Nations. To discuss the surrender of Formosa to the United Nations is a weakening of our entire military position in the Far East, a betrayal of the Nationalist Government of China, and a surrender of the only considerable armed force in the Far East which remains to oppose further Communist aggression.

The proposal is even worse when we consider that the Nationalist Government is not to be represented in the conference, nor is the established Government of the Republic of Korea to be recognized, although it was set up under UN auspices and recognized by the UN. Of course, it would be far better to retire under our own power as at Hungnam to a defensible position in Japan, Okinawa, and Formosa, and retain complete freedom as to the admission of Communist China and the disposition of Formosa.

This cease-fire plan is the most complete surrender to which the United States has ever agreed. Of course, it encourages aggression, and it is only a question of time before the Communist armies, released by the cease-fire in Korea, and the hamstringing of Chiang's army, will march on down into Indochina and southeastern Asia. It has long seemed obvious to me that, if we wish to prevent the spread of communism, we must release Chiang's army from its present neutrality and furnish such arms as may be necessary for him to create a diversion against Chinese Communist advance in southeast Asia. If this brings war between the United States and the Chinese Communists, it is nothing different from what we now have—in fact, it would be a much less dangerous war to us, much less fatal to our men, and much less expensive in material.

THE PRICE OF EGGS

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I wish to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that farmers are getting only 30 cents a dozen for their eggs. In some cases they are getting as low as 21 cents a dozen. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a letter sent to me by Emil Pederson, of route 2, Berthold, N. Dak.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BERTHOLD, N. DAK., January 5, 1951.

Hon. WILLIAM LANGER,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LANGER: I just sold a few cases of eggs yesterday. I received the magnificent sum of 30 cents a dozen, and this is in January in North Dakota. Could anything be done to stabilize the market?

What has been done to scale down or cancel the old seed loans of drought years? We are not all millionaires in North Dakota, either. This might be a good time to do something for those on the old home front, too, as well as in foreign nations. The old saying is, "Charity begins at home."

With kind personal regard and best wishes,

EMIL PEDERSON.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an article entitled "Speculators Rig Market—Egg Market Booms and Busts" appearing in the January 1951 issue of Facts for Farmers, which is published in New York City.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPECULATORS RIG MARKET—EGG MARKET BOOMS AND BUSTS

After sending up egg prices on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange to a 30-year high, speculators then pulled out the plug and let the prices plummet downward. Poultry farmers whose prices have fluctuated 100 percent or more in the past few weeks objected to being cast in the role of Humpty-Dumpty and consumers, struggling to make their dollars stretch as inflation sends prices higher, have also been asking questions.

Shortly after Secretary of Agriculture Brannan announced on November 22 that Government must drop its egg-support program and that retail egg prices would fall below this year's level, speculators on the Chicago and New York exchanges began to gun the prices. Instead of the usual post-Thanksgiving decline, retail prices for top quality eggs shot up to $1 and even $1.10 per dozen in some cities as wholesale prices were marked up to 72 cents on the Chicago market and 80 cents on the New York market, more than double their previous levels.

EXPLANATIONS OR EXCUSES

In reporting the record-breaking high reached on the Chicago exchange, the Wall Street Journal of December 8 offered these explanations from the traders:

"'Terrific consumption—more than anyone dreamed there would be—is the main reason for the price rise,' one egg man here said. 'Four weeks ago, I don't think there was an informed observer in the country who believed egg prices would go up. Almost everyone was looking for lower prices.'"

Other explanations blamed the tie-up of transportation facilities by the storm, and the disruption of eastern supplies as a result of hurricane damage to poultry farms. Another explanation, more important but nevertheless secondary, was current in the trade, namely, that the Army had been buying about 100 cars of shell eggs weekly.

CHICAGO MERCANTILE EXCHANGE

The chief explanation, however, is that the big egg speculators manipulated the market and made a killing. Farmers have been well aware of the fact that the market had continued to soar and dip in rapid fashion even after the scandal of last year, which led to a Government investigation of the Chicago Mercantile Exchange. To avoid a repetition of the egg scandal which broke over the Chicago Mercantile Exchange a year ago, a veil of secrecy was quickly thrown over the current situation. The New York Times reported that the board of governors of the Chicago Mercantile Exchange called an emergency meeting on December 11 to discuss the crisis which had caught many of the traders short, but not a word came out of what was said or done at this meeting.

Last year, when the Chicago egg market went on a spree, the local supervisor of the Commodity Exchange Authority wired to Washington on October 11, 1949:

"Complaints are that market being manipulated. Please consult with appropriate officials or committee of Chicago Mercantile Exchange and remind them that CEA can prosecute manipulation and corners."

TRADING SUSPENDED

On the same day the board of governors of the Chicago Mercantile Exchange suspended trading in egg futures and fixed an arbitrary price of 53 cents a dozen at which "short" interests could settle with "longs." The Commodity Exchange Authority, which is an agency of the United States Department of Agriculture, meanwhile conducted its investigation. Not until 8 months later, in May 1950, did it make public its report, titled "Investigation of the October 1949 Futures Contract on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange." This belated report offered no conclusions and no proposals for action. It did not even reveal the identities of the big traders.

Yet the report disclosed that one of the traders, identified only as Trader A, had bought more than 300 carloads of eggs for October delivery, more than twice as many as were available for delivery. It further disclosed that two other big traders, identified only as Trader B and Trader C, had acted in collusion with Trader A and had accounts carried on the books of Trader A.

Having bought more eggs than could be delivered, this ring was able to shoot up the price and put a squeeze on the shorts, forcing them to pay as much as 55 cents a dozen for eggs that could not be sold on the cash market for 47 cents a dozen. When trading was stopped, the ring raised a loud protest and insisted that the shorts should be made to pay at lease 61 cents a dozen instead of the 53-cent price fixed as a settlement by the exchange.

A. & P. RULES ROOST

The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. is the biggest egg handler in the country, and its egg-buying operations on the big exchanges as well as on the local markets usually set the pace. However, the CEA made no comment on the position of the A. & P. or other chain-store interests at the time of the October corner. Nor did it comment on the activities of the large milk companies and meat packers, whose egg operations are also considerable. In describing the A. & P.'s operations on the New York exchange, one broker said:

"They order their traders to buy up all the eggs in sight, and feverish buying continues until they give the signal to stop. Then, buying comes to a standstill and the prices drop."

In paying the poultry farmers for their eggs, the dealers in the eastern markets fix the prices according to the Tuesday and Friday quotations on the New York exchange. Farmers point out that on these days the price of eggs has often dropped as much as 5 to 6 cents a dozen and then is marked up again the very next day. Yet no attempt has been made to halt this brazen manipulation.

CEA TOOK NO ACTION

The failure of the Commodity Exchange Authority to take any effective action has only served to encourage the speculators with the result that both farmers and consumers have been the victims of continuous up-and-down manipulations.

The action taken by Secretary of Agriculture Brannan in halting egg support operations will, according to many poultrymen, put them completely at the mercy of the speculators since no floor of any sort is left under egg prices. Instead of the 90 percent of parity guarantees which prevailed in 1949, Congress made egg supports discretionary in 1950 and Brannan lowered the rate to a vague annual average of 75 percent parity for the Nation. For 1951, Brannan has announced that no more dried eggs will be bought and that the Department will not undertake to name any minimum but will explore the possibility of buying limited quantities of shell eggs in whatever local markets it deems deserving. This substitution of a pious hope for what had been a vague promise is not likely to satisfy poultry farmers.

POULTRYMEN BAND TOGETHER

Already a National Poultry Producers Association has been formed to lead the fight for "equality of treatment" and poultry groups in various States, such as New Jersey, California, Iowa, Connecticut, and New York, have joined the organization. "Should the present inequitable egg-feed ratio continue, for another year," they declared in a letter to Secretary Brannan, "many family-size egg producers will be forced off the farm."

They are urging equal treatment of eggs along with other basic crops and also subsidies, such as those proposed in the original Brannan program, to benefit consumers. Temporary cochairmen of the new association are Clarence Althouse of Fleetwood, Pa., and Mrs. Elmer A. Gustafson, of Madrid, Iowa, with Louis Slocum of Trenton, N. J., as acting secretary.

Mr. LANGER. I wish to read one paragraph from a letter which I have received from a farmer named Alex Haaven, of Langdon, N. Dak.:

A farmer was in the other day; he told me he got 21 cents a dozen for eggs and it so happened a couple from Langdon was to the city a few days ago and told me eggs are $1 a dozen there. Then the farmer gets the blame for high prices.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S BUDGET FOR 1952

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, the annual budget message was presented to the Congress last week by President Truman. Today I ask the President to voluntarily recall this budget. I ask him to call it back so that he can prepare and submit to the Congress a realistic budget, which can be honestly justified.

The executive branch of the Government makes use of the facilities of the Bureau of the Budget in preparing and submitting spending requests to the Congress. This Bureau comprises about 500 employees. It was created to enable the executive branch to cooperate with the Congress in achieving economy and efficiency in the Federal Government.

I believe it is fair to assume that the employees of the Budget Bureau can do a realistic, competent, honest job if they are permitted to do so. I believe it is possible to prepare a realistic budget—a budget which takes into account the national and international problems of January 1951—a budget which strives for economy—a budget which says "No" to requests for money, no matter how meritorious, which can and should be postponed.

There are 50 members of the House Committee on Appropriations which will consider this budget. There are 21 members of the Senate committee. The professional staff of the House committee employs four persons on a part-time basis to explore this budget. I use the word "explore" because they can do little more than that. On the Senate side, there is one man assigned to the minority, from the professional staff, to act as an advance scout as we proceed through this maze of figures.

Obviously, it is unreasonable to expect the Congress to appropriate funds in an orderly and reasonable manner when the committees must start with so flimsy and incomplete a document as the President's budget. We must have a more realistic base from which to operate.

The situation has become progressively worse in the last two decades. For some years the committees tried to cope with the expanding requests for money on the theory that the Executive was making a real effort to keep our fiscal affairs on a sound basis. Then, it became apparent that our Nation was being committed to a policy of deficit spending.

I remember very well the statement made by a very distinguished Democrat when I first came to the Senate, and when we started on the road to loose fiscal policies. That man was Pat Harrison, of Mississippi. He said, "This country can no more spend its way to prosperity than a drunken man can drink himself sober." That statement was true then, and it is true today.

Congress, of necessity, has resorted to across-the-board attempts to cut Federal spending. The so-called Bridges-Byrd amendment, sponsored by 35 Senators, which passed the Senate by a vote of 56–31 last year was such an attempt on a selective basis.

It was lost in conference with the House. In return we got a $550,000,000 reduction, which was a substantial cut, but it was not applied on the principle of the Bridges-Byrd amendment.

I submit, such documents as this budget must be cut in some manner. But within the limitations of time and manpower, and in the absence of genuine cooperation from the executive department, just how can the Congress attempt to impose some degree of realism in our Federal fiscal picture?

The distinguished and able senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] cooperated with every group in the Congress—Republicans as well as members of his own party—whenever attempts were made to obtain economy. He helped us in the Eightieth Congress, when the Republicans controlled the Congress, and for 2 years we balanced the Federal budget. The senior Senator from Virginia has a reputation for being somewhat conservative. I never knew him to use language with anything but restraint. Nevertheless, he stated that the President's budget is the "very height of fiscal irresponsibility."

I believe that the Truman budget is an invitation to disaster.

Surely, President Truman knows that America is the hard core of civilization's ability to resist Russia's communism. He should know that Stalin cannot rule the world as long as America's ability to produce is arrayed against him. President Truman should know that America will live until she decays and becomes rotten from within. This budget is a long step in the direction of decay.

If Stalin himself were given the opportunity to weaken America from within, he could scarcely produce a plan better calculated to destroy this Government. We are being asked, literally, to spend ourselves to ruin.

While President Truman's budget is bad enough on the surface, it is the hidden figures which make it such an unrealistic and deceitful document.

The press notified the American people that their President had asked for seventy-one billion five hundred million during the new fiscal year. That is what the budget appeared to say. Yet, the budget actually requests authority to spend $94,500,000,000 and another four billions to liquidate old bills. On close examination we find the President has submitted justification for about twenty and five-tenths billions. Included in this amount is his Fair Deal program, the same old socialism in a new disguise. He states the armed services will need sixty-one billion, but he is unable to say just how this will be spent, by which branch of the service it will be spent or how he arrives at this total. He asked for ten and six-tenths billions for foreign aid, but neglects to state whether this is for economic assistance or military assistance.

The President of the United States has set up an arbitrary figure and submitted it to Congress with justification for only a small percentage of that figure. In other words, he says to the departments, "Here is the figure which I have taken out of the air or somewhere else and set up as the spending figure for the next fiscal year. Now you go ahead and justify it up to that amount." So far as I know, that has never been done before.

President Truman estimates a $16,500,000,000 deficit and urges that the Congress provide this amount in new taxes. He comes out strong for a balanced budget—to be balanced by new taxes. This is the one encouraging part of his message—his desire to balance the budget, not his desire for more taxes. I only wish he had shown some concern for balancing the budget during the last 3 years instead of waiting until we got in a war situation when he knows it is next to impossible to balance the budget.

Year after year I have listened to the budget message of the President of the United States, and he has said something like this: "This year we have emergency problems so that we cannot balance the budget, but wait until next year."

That reminds me of Mark Twain. Mark Twain once made a New Year's resolution. He said in the resolution, "This year I am going to live within my income, even if I have to borrow money to do it." That is typical of the Truman approach to the budget.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Is it not true that the only time the budget was balanced in modern times was twice during the Eightieth Congress?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is true.

Mr. MILLIKIN. And is it not true that the Republican majority which was then in control of Congress was denounced for balancing it?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is true; yes.

Actually, sixteen and five-tenths billions will not come close to balancing our Federal books. That which the President does not mention, but which the people must realize, is that Uncle Sam must eventually pay all his bills. Last June 30 our national debt was carried by the Treasury at two hundred fifty-seven and four-tenths billions, yet there was a carry-over of thirteen and five-tenths billions in unexpended balances on the books—in other words, unpaid bills. We had contracted for goods and services which had not been delivered or had not been billed. By adding the amount of the national debt and our unpaid bills, we find we were actually two hundred and seventy and nine-tenths billions in debt as of last June 30.

A close look at this budget reveals we may have a total of fifty-five billions in these unpaid bills by next June 30. The total may be as high as eighty billions by June 30, 1952. If, in 1953 the actual disbursement of Government funds was to catch up to deliveries on Federal contracts, our deficit, in addition to the national debt, would be increased by forty or fifty billions even if we increased revenues to as much as seventy billions a year.

On the basis of President Truman's own estimate, our national debt by next June 30 will be two hundred and seventy-six and three-tenths billions unless we raise new taxes. This exceeds the statutory limit of two hundred and seventy-five billions and takes no account of our unpaid bills on that date. Our Government cannot run a gigantic check kite indefinitely.

To discuss the unpaid bill situation is not intended to be a criticism of the military or of industry. Our production machine simply is not as yet geared to produce as fast as matériel is ordered. But the day will inevitably come when the tools of war must be paid for. And I do criticize the President for not telling the American people of the terrible years which lie ahead when the impact of this spending really hits our economy.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The Senator said in one of his previous paragraphs that the President has asked for $71,500,000,000 for this fiscal year, and yet a close scrutiny will show that request is made to spend $94,500,000,000, and $4,000,000,000 more to liquidate old bills. The books of the United States Government are carried on a cash basis. Is not the Senator saying that under this year's budget the President requests $94,500,000,000 in contract authority and appropriations of new money, even though only $71,000,000,000 can be actually spent on a cash basis in the fiscal year 1952. Is that correct?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct. He wants to spend seventy-one and five-tenths billions in cash and he asks the authority to obligate the balance of the ninety-four and five-tenths billions.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Yes. So that when the Senator from New Hampshire states that unpaid bills are going to continue to accumulate up to forty or fifty billion dollars in the next 2 years, what he is saying is that there is authority for the departments to spend, even though the bills may be not paid within the fiscal year for which the money is appropriated?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. It is extremely important to realize that an appropriation and an expenditure are two different things?

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The Congress appropriates, but the administration spends, and unless the administration is willing to cut down its spending, the Congress can do very little about it. Is that not a fact?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is a fact.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Did I not also understand from what the distinguished Senator said that of the $71,500,000,000 to be spent, a very large amount of that is simply lump-summed?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

Let me say to the Senator from Colorado that instead of coming up here with a budget itemized and justified to the total amount, the President justifies only slightly more than $20,000,000,000 out of the $71,500,000,000.' The rest is only a blank request in various lump sums.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Instead of building the budget up by justification from the ground up, the administration decides upon a sum of money as though it were a pie, and then cuts it in pieces to satisfy the various branches of the armed services. Is not that the technique which is followed?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is the technique very well explained.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. CASE. Does the $94,500,000,000 figure include the indefinite and permanent appropriations or the money required for the interest on the national debt?

Mr. BRIDGES. No; it does not include items of a permanent or indefinite nature.

Mr. CASE. Then, that might bring the figure up to $100,000,000,000?

Mr. BRIDGES. It could reach that figure, yes.

Mr. CASE. What about the obligations on the Treasury for the purchase of debentures issued by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or the Commodity Credit Corporation? Does the ninety-odd-billion-dollar figure make any allowance for demands on the Treasury for the purchase of such debentures?

Mr. BRIDGES. I will say to the Senator that I first spoke of a figure of $71,500,000,000 and then I spoke of a figure of $94,500,000,000. Both figures include the interest and servicing on the national debt but do not include permanent and indefinite items.

Mr. CASE. Nor do they include the demands on the Treasury for the purchase of debentures?

Mr. BRIDGES. I am not certain that they include contingent demands on the Treasury for the purchase of debentures.

Mr. CASE. Then, the actual cash demand on the Treasury in the coming year may be far greater than suggested by the President's figures.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is entirely possible. The able Senator from South Dakota has pointed to the situation as the result of his experience on the House Appropriations Committee. I think he has hit a very significant thing.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The Senator from New Hampshire has had much more experience with matters of this kind than I have. I ask him if it is not true that it is the responsibility of the Director of the Budget and the Bureau of the Budget to find justification for the requests of the various departments? But in this instance the departments have not justified their requests, and the Bureau of the Budget and the Budget Director have not justified the budget to the President, and the President has not made any justification to Congress. Therefore, there are several deficiencies in the proper presentation of the budget. Is that not correct?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct. It is a complete ring-around-the-rosy.

Perhaps the President of the United States does not care, although I hope he does. Perhaps he has his sights set on 1952. Perhaps he thinks the fiscal disaster will wait until he has gone; that it will then be possible to ask a Republican President and a Republican Congress to assume the responsibility for this fiscal farce. I do not know; perhaps that is the reason for the President's position.

The outright deceit practiced by the White House is not altogether apparent from this budget. We must also consider the press release issued by the President on January 15 coincident with his budget message. He claimed that he saved the taxpayers over $5,000,000,000 by not requesting as much he he did last year. The release lists 130 items in which savings are claimed. I ask unanimous consent that this White House press release, from the Executive Office of the President, be printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
BUREAU OF THE BUDGET,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1951.

At the President's press seminar on the 1952 budget, it was stated that over 40 percent of the individual appropriation items showed less new obligational authority for 1952 than for 1951.

The following tabulation lists these items segregated in the same categories as those used in the "Analysis of New Obligational Authority and Budget Expenditures" distributed at the seminar. The list is made up of items for the executive branch where less authority to incur new obligations is requested for 1952 than is now available or recommended for 1951, excluding permanent and indefinite appropriations and items dependent on proposed legislation.

There are 130 such items listed, representing about 42 percent of the total number of appropriation items for the executive branch, excluding permanent and indefinite appropriations and items dependent on proposed legislation. Other items of this total require either the same amounts of new obligational authority for the 2 years or show increases for 1952.

Fifteen of these items with decreases totaling $3,679,175,285 fall in the category Major National Security Programs. The Atomic Energy Commission, stockpiling, and maritime ship construction show decreases in 1952 because of large advance financing of these continuing programs in 1951.

Appropriation items in 1952 budget reflecting decrease in new obligational authority, 1952 compared with 1951

	1951	1952	Decrease below 1951

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Do I correctly understand that the President of the United States says a saving occurs when he does not ask for as much as he might have asked for? [Laughter.]

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes; that is exactly what I mean.

For instance, Mr. President, let us consider a very small item on the list of 130 items which we are told require less funds in 1952 than were asked or made available in 1951. On page 209 of the President's budget, the item "Employee health service programs (Public Health Service)" appears. The President's press release, on page 4, shows $50,000 for this purpose for 1951, and nothing for 1952; therefore he says that on that item he has saved $50,000. However, when we look at the footnote following that $50,000 item on page 209 of the budget, we find this:

> Estimate of $75,000 for activities previously carried under this title has been transferred in the estimates to "Hospital and medical care, Public Health Service."

So we see how these claims are made. Certainly under such circumstances it is easy to understand his statement that "savings" have been made in the case of 130 items. How many such "savings" are there in a budget amounting to 1,032 pages and with approximately 600 additional pages in an appendix? So we are told that savings are made, although at the bottom of the page we find a note that the item is included elsewhere and actually is increased. That is just a sample of what we find in the President's budget.

I have selected at random some of the more obvious frauds. They remind me of a man who spent $5,000 to buy his wife a fur coat last year, and who thinks she saved him $5,000 because she did not buy another fur coat this year. Exactly the same principle is used in this case. The President lists these items, and says he has saved so many thousands of dollars; but the principle is exactly the same as that involved when a man who bought his wife a fur coat for $5,000 last year, says that this year he has saved $5,000 by not buying another fur coat for his wife.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The Senator has been a member of the Appropriations Committee for many years. Is it not true that in this case first the President has to set forth with the requests the justifications made by the department heads; and, of course, the President must rely upon their requests. Then the Director of the Bureau of the Budget lists the requests, and cuts them down wherever he thinks they should be decreased, in accordance with his view of what is needed to run the Government. Then the President, in turn, revises and estimates in accordance with what he thinks is necessary for the operation of the Government; and, subsequently, the Appropriations Committees of the two Houses of Congress must place great reliance upon those figures, if they think the figures have been worked out properly.

In this case there are no justifications by the departments or by the Bureau of the Budget or by the President; so if Congress, through its Appropriations Committees, is going to do a thorough job, those committees must begin on absolutely untouched ground, and must prepare the appropriations in a very short time. Is not that true?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct. Mr. President, let me give a few examples of the 130 items:

First. Senators will note the item entitled "Contributions to International Organizations." President Truman, in asking for thirty and six-tenths millions, claims a savings of twenty-three and seven-tenths millions over last year. We should recall that twenty-five million was appropriated last year under this heading for the International Refugee Organization. The International Refugee Organization has completed its program, and is being liquidated. The President has claimed he saved money because he did not ask for funds for a nonexistent organization. In other words, the President claims that he has saved money because he has not asked for funds with which to carry on a nonexistent program. That is a typical example of the President's so-called savings.

Let me give other examples; the next is a good one:

Second. Another item, wherein the President claims to have saved nearly twenty millions, is under the title

"Seventeenth Decennial Census." Since the census was completed according to law, in 1950, it is no wonder that he does not include an item for the taking of another decennial census in 1951. Therefore, how is the President effectuating any great saving for the country by not including funds for another complete census in 1951?

Third. Last year we appropriated three hundred and fifty million for ship construction under the Maritime Commission. This year the President asks for no funds under this heading, and claims a savings of three hundred and fifty million. Since we appropriated funds to build 50 fast cargo ships, in the supplemental appropriation bill, passed during the last days of the Eighty-first Congress, it is small wonder that there is no immediate need for additional funds for that purpose. But it can hardly be said that money has been saved by providing it in a supplemental bill, instead of as a part of the regular budget.

Fourth. The President claims he saved two and nine one-hundredths billion under the item listed for "Stockpiling strategic and critical materials." We appropriated two and nine-tenths billion last year, and are asked for eight hundred and twenty million this year Since we have not been able to obtain the materials we tried to buy last year, and have a large unexpended balance in this fund, I cannot see how the President has made any valid saving when he has not asked for more funds for this purpose this year. Yet that is a part of the $5,000,000,000 which he loudly claims he has saved. There can be no valid savings in not asking for money we could not spend in any event.

Fifth. Another doubtful claim is that he saved one and three-tenths billion by cutting back veterans' benefits. We are well aware that veterans, for the most part, have made use of their rights under the GI bill, and that no administrative discretion is involved in a law which has become inoperative.

I have not had time to run down every item in this list of 130, but I am confident the same specious reasoning can be found throughout the list. This is the same Chief Executive who is asking Congress to pass new taxes.

However, Mr. President, considering the last item I have mentioned, if the veterans have reached the point where they have completed their studies or their work under the GI bill of rights, and if we do not have another crop of veterans coming along to take their place, it is no wonder that we do not provide funds for doing a job which is almost completed. That is just another example of the savings the President claims he has made.

Mr. President, I expect we shall have to pass some new tax legislation to get America prepared militarily. But I, for one, will refuse to vote for new taxes until an honest and comprehensive effort is made to abolish the frills of government.

The Executive, without urging from Congress, should volunteer to lead the way. The Bureau of the Budget should be authorized to prepare a budget which excludes every nonessential program. Specifically, a realistic budget would ignore every new program; for instance, such items, which are included in the budget now submitted to us, as additional subsidies to agriculture, proposals to expand Federal industrial and electric power facilities at the expense of private enterprise, socialized medicine, Federal aid to education, and plans to increase Federal control over State-administered unemployment compensation systems. All of these must be eliminated altogether. Yet the President has all of them in his budget, whereas all of them should be excluded from the appropriations to be provided for this year.

In addition, we can forego river and harbor development, civilian public works projects, and all other peacetime acivities, the relation of which to defense needs is explained only by the most tortuous reasoning.

Last September President Truman called on the American people to prepare to accept some reduction in their standards of living. He asked them to exercise patriotic self-restraint in their personal and private affairs.

It seems only fair that the American people should expect their President, rollicking in his tax exemptions, to give his departments and bureaus the same advice. Only when government has reduced its standard of living has it any right to ask its citizens to do likewise.

Remember, Mr. President, that when President Truman called on the American people to be prepared to accept a reduction in their standards of living, he asked them to exercise patriotic self-restraint in their personal and private affairs. Now, if the President of the United States is going to ask every individual citizen to reduce his standard of living and to make sacrifices, certainly the Federal Government should lead the way and should set the example. The President has done exactly the reverse in submitting this budget. A more complicated, confused, illogical budget than this was never presented to the American Congress. Let us not be fooled by it. Imagine the President coming to the Congress and asking for $71,500,000,000 in expenditures, which really exceeds $94,000,000,000 in authorizations and justifying only slightly more than $20,000,000,000 of it. Never before, during the time I have been in the Senate, which is 15 years, has anyone had the audacity to come to the American Congress and make the demands for money which we find presented at this time, and for which in most instances, we find no attempt at justification.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. There is a law on the books that has to do with the legislative budget. Will the distinguished Senator advise us what happened to the legislative budget in the last session of the Congress, and also what happened to it in this session?

Mr. BRIDGES. My memory of what happened is that it is now a sadly forgotten piece of legislation. It was placed on the statute books, and the Republican Congress, the Eightieth Congress, tried to carry it out to the best of its ability, but it was forgotten by the Eighty-first Congress.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Is that not another way of saying that the preceding Congress and the present Congress, under the control of the administrative power, have violated the law?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is substantially correct.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. McFARLAND. Did the Eightieth Congress arrive at a final decision on the budget?

Mr. BRIDGES. It certainly did.

Mr. McFARLAND. Did the House and the Senate concur in it?

Mr. BRIDGES. They certainly concurred, in the final report which was a legislative budget.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. CASE. As a matter of fact, is it not true that the legislative-budget law merely required the Joint Legislative Committee to make a report to Congress, and that it, of course, could not guarantee action by the Congress? Is it not also a fact that in both instances, in the Eightieth Congress, the Joint Budget Committee made the report?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct. The succeeding committees entrusted with making the report did not even have an opportunity to consider it.

Mr. CASE. That is correct.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. In connection with the question raised by the Senator from Colorado, I should like to ask the Senator's opinion on this point: Last year, for the first time, we passed the unified appropriation bill. This year, I have read in the press that there is some discussion in the House as to whether it would be a wise procedure to continue it. Is it not the Senator's opinion in view of the requests made by the President, without justifications, that the only proper thing the Congress can do is to pass one appropriation bill, because it is only in that way that it will be possible for us to have an over-all look at the entire picture of what we are doing?

Mr. BRIDGES. I think that is correct. I am sorry that there is this division over the one-package appropriation bill, for that is the one way by which we can get an over-all look at the entire picture. President Truman's budget is an insult to the American people and an affront to the committees of Congress which are responsible for examining it. I believe it should be recalled. I believe it should be completed so that there is genuine justification for each and every item. I believe it should not be returned until nondefense spending has been cut substantially. Excepting fixed expenses, such as debt service, veterans' pensions, and social-security benefits, Government spending should be cut at least 10 percent, and in some cases as much as 50 or 60 percent, or eliminated.

I believe a Federal budget should be something more than a political propaganda vehicle. If the President and his Budget Bureau are incapable of preparing an honest and realistic budget, I believe they should admit it.

Mr. President, we have reached a point in the conduct of the Federal Government where we are facing a very serious international crisis. It is important that we be prepared militarily; that we be strong militarily; but it is equally important that we be strong economically. It is equally important that we be sound and solvent at home. It is very important that we eliminate the frills of government at this time. I was amazed and shocked recently to pick up a newspaper—it was the Washington Daily News—and to note the summary of the article headed "No personnel cuts."

Let me cite a few examples. These are all nondefense matters. The Federal Communications Commission jobs are to be increased from 1,289 to 1,305. They are going to increase the number of employees in that agency. Let me cite another case. The Civil Service Commission proposes to increase permanent jobs from 3,990 to 4,853. That is a nondefense agency. Let us note some of the other agencies. The National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics proposes to increase the jobs from 7,161 to 8,961; the Interstate Commerce Commission, from 1,869 to 1,897; and so forth, all down the line, department after department. Day by day, the press publishes items about new jobs. The Federal departments do not need to worry, because there are to be no cuts. On the contrary, there are to be increases. Of course, we must have increases in the personnel in the defense agencies. Even then, it is unnecessary that the increases be made at the rate at which they are being made today. But in the nondefense agencies, in a period of national strife, how the President of the United States can say to the country, "You have got to sacrifice, you have got to lower your standards, you have got to get along with less," and then, come before the Congress asking increases in many items, and concealing other items in the guise of defense spending, is more than I know. It is a good time to remind ourselves of the story told of the Vermont legislator, to whom it was proposed that a bill authorizing the purchase of a mansion for the Governor of that State be enacted. The legislator was an old man from one of the Green Mountain towns. Vermont is a small State, and the proposal to purchase a mansion for the Governor involved the expenditure of considerable money. The old legislator rose and said, "Just a minute, Mr. Speaker, before we vote. I am against spending money we ain't got for something we don't need."

That is a very simple maxim, but something of that spirit should be injected into the thinking of the administration today. I say very frankly, Mr. President, that we are headed toward disastrous inflation today. We are faced with a grave international situation, yet we find in the budget items for socialized medicine, Federal aid to education, the Brannan plan, and all these other pet schemes which I thought, after hearing the message of the President on the state of the Union, the President had decided to eliminate.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Is it not true that this excessive spending over the years has reduced the value of the dollar from 100 cents to 45 or 50 cents?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is substantially correct.

Mr. MILLIKIN. If the same process is continued, will the dollar not come to be a no-cents dollar?

Mr. BRIDGES. Certainly that is a logical conclusion.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FERGUSON. Did the Senator see the cartoon by Jim Berryman in the Washington Evening Star a few days ago, in which he depicted national defense in a Mother Hubbard, and placed under the skirt all the different things such as socialized medicine, the Brannan plan, and various other programs of the so-called welfare state? Does not the Senator think that cartoon aptly describes the budget which was sent to the Congress?

Mr. BRIDGES. I think it certainly does. I want to say to the distinguished Senator from Michigan and the other Senators on the floor, let us not for a moment think that the people of the country do not know what is going on. The people are angry, confused, and bewildered. They will become more confused and bewildered when they realize we are approaching a great international crisis in which, while the United States Government advocates cutting the people's standard of living, the same Government expands its own standard of living.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I desire to compliment the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire for his remarks, but I should like to ask what the remedy is. Is not the remedy here in the Congress, in the Appropriations Committees? We can put our foot down and say, "Nothing doing." We can check item after item and say that if the House will collaborate, we have the answer. After all, the President is not the legislature.

I should like to make another suggestion and should like to get the Senator's opinion. Under the Reorganization Act we are supposed to check up on the President. I know that in certain States of the Union when a new governor assumed office in order to promote efficiency, he asked the great industrial concerns of the State to provide efficiency experts for him. They would go into the various departments and make a report, and the governor would then suggest to the legislature where cuts could be applied. The question I should like to ask the Senator is this: We have considered the Hoover resolutions. Has the Senator seen any efficiency come out of them? Efficiency has not come out of them because the Executive has not applied the ideas contained in those resolutions.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct. The President selected the Hoover ideas he approved.

Mr. WILEY. But he did not efficiently apply them.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

Mr. WILEY. Under the Reorganization Act, would it be possible—I have been giving considerable thought to this question—for the Senate and the House, one or both, to create an efficiency committee which would check on the administrative branch and see where all the extra spending occurs? If the Senator cannot answer that question positively, I should like to have a legal answer. The thing to do is to provide for such an efficiency committee and enable it to find where savings can be made. It will be a guide to the Appropriations Committees.

Mr. BRIDGES. I think the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin has a very logical thought. I have long felt that the legislative branch of the Government must be more competently staffed than it is at the present time. I think that a larger staff is one of the few logical solutions we have in order to meet this terrifically complex problem.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is it not also true that in the Budget Bureau there are something like 500 employees?

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON. In contrast the staffs of the Appropriations Committees of the House and Senate are exceedingly small. Therefore, to a great extent, without larger staffs at our disposal in Congress, we must rely upon the advice of the Bureau of the Budget as it is contained in the President's budget and his analyses. Is not that correct?

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON. But is it not also true that we actually find in the budget evidence that contradicts all the savings that are indicated on the surface and claimed by the President? For instance, do we not find such things as transfers from trust funds? Those transfers reveal that supposed savings are not coming out of appropriations, as real savings, but are merely charges against those trust funds. Is it not possible that we shall be called upon later to make up any deficits in the trust funds by subsequent appropriations?

Does the Senator have in mind such examples of phony savings?

Mr. BRIDGES. I have several of them. But I have been trying to digest the budget. It is a terrific document.

Mr. FERGUSON. I thought the Senator might have in mind an example which appears on page 234 of the budget. On that page the President compares 1951 appropriations and 1952 appropriation requests for salaries in the office of general counsel in the Federal Security Agency. The comparison indicates an apparent saving of $5,100. But when we verify the figures it is noted that in addition to 1952 appropriation requests there is an item of advance from Federal old-age and survivor insurance trust funds. The transfer amounts to $18,055. The President claims a saving of $5,100 in direct appropriations. But he raids the trust fund for $18,055, or a net increase of about $13,000.

That trust fund consists of payroll deductions and other contributions for social-security coverage. The President's little trick is simply to take the whole of the $18,055 and the net increase of $13,000 out of that fund and use it for salaries in the office of general counsel, while claiming he has made a saving. It is a neat bit of sleight of hand, but does not the trust fund necessarily suffer and is it not possible that we may later be called upon to cover it?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is typical of the sort of thing the President included in his list of 130 items.

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BRICKER. As I understand the budget submitted by the President, it calls for approximately $16,000,000,000 more of expenditures this year than we will receive from the present taxation program.

Mr. BRIDGES. $16,500,000,000 more.

Mr. BRICKER. Then we are forced either to cut expenditures for the normal affairs of government, or to levy new taxes.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

Mr. BRICKER. The only alternative to a program of that kind is the sale of bonds, is it not?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

Mr. BRICKER. In the Second World War, as I remember, approximately 25 percent of the cost of the war was not met by borrowings or by taxation, but came out of bank loans, which are inflationary.

I was induced to ask this question and to follow it through by the question of the Senator from Colorado a few moments ago with reference to the dollar having depreciated to approximately 55 cents. The only way to hold down inflation as I understand, and to keep from further adulterating the dollar, is to pay the cost of this war out of current taxation, as much as possible.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is substantially correct.

Mr. BRICKER. The sale of bonds to the banks and the financial institutions of the country would be highly inflationary.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

Mr. BRICKER. Then, we are left with only one other recourse, and that is the sale of bonds to individual citizens. The 55-cent dollar to be received for the bonds purchased some 10 years ago is certainly not very encouraging to the public to buy bonds.

Mr. BRIDGES. No. It is a serious problem.

Mr. BRICKER. It is going to be difficult to sell bonds to the public unless there is some assurance by the Government that the dollar is not going to be further adulterated.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

Mr. BRICKER. Does the Senator know of any other period when there has been such a depreciation in the value of the dollar as there has been in the past 15 years?

Mr. BRIDGES. No; I do not know of any other similar period in modern times.

Mr. BRICKER. It has been induced by unsound Government fiscal and credit policies and by overspending on needless programs by the Federal Government. So that, as we face the present crisis, we have a dual problem, first, of meeting aggression on the part of the Communists around the world and building up our Army, Navy, and Air Force; and, second, we have a problem which is just as important to our ultimate economy, the safety of our people, and the freedom of those who come after us, in keeping down further inflation. An inflationary program even equal to that of the Second World War would do great damage and might destroy our free economy, as we see it.

Therefore I wish to emphasize the approach of the Senator from New Hampshire by bringing to the attention of the Senate the fact that we must not further permit a cut in the value of the dollar or an adulteration of the dollar if we hope to raise the money through the sale of bonds to the public, which would take the money out of the channels of trade and further hold down inflation. Does the Senator know what a 1-percent sales tax would bring in by way of return to the Federal Government?

Mr. BRIDGES. No; I do not know.

Mr. BRICKER. My understanding is that it would bring in approximately $1,000,000,000. Many municipal governments and State governments are relying on sales taxes now as a source of revenue, and it is my understanding that it would take a 10-percent sales tax, which would be levied on top of State and municipal sales taxes, to bring in $10,000,000,000 to the Federal Government. Such a tax might further depress trade, and consequently might not result in a return of $10,000,000,000 to the Federal Government. Therefore we would be $6,000,000,000 short of the budget which the President has submitted to Congress. Of course that $6,000,000,000 could be raised in only one of two ways. It could be saved by a refusal to spend the total amount, thus cutting the budget by $6,000,000,000, or it would have to be raised by increasing the rate of tax on individual incomes and corporation incomes. Perhaps we have not yet reached the point of diminishing return, but it is likely that such increases would inhibit business and perhaps destroy incentive for economy and efficiency in business.

Therefore we are faced today with the problem of cutting the budget. It is imperative to do so if we are to avoid further depreciation in the value of the dollar, and maintain free business, at the same time strengthening the backbone of our war effort, which is the productive capacity of business. Such a budget as is proposed would destroy efficiency and incentive in business, and perhaps might even then not produce the money necessary. Have I correctly analyzed the situation?

Mr. BRIDGES. The Senator from Ohio has certainly analyzed the problem and has very properly stated his conclusions, in which I concur.

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire further yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. BRICKER. The distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] has called my attention to the fact that he has received letters from people in his State asking whether or not they should sell their Government bonds and perhaps buy land or commodities as a hedge against possible inflation. Inflation would be inevitable if the proposed budget were approved by Congress. Does the Senator know whether or not in the past few months more bonds were sold by the public—not by banks—than were purchased by the public?

Mr. BRIDGES. I cannot answer that question.

Mr. BRICKER. It is true, and to my mind it is a very ominous indication of the practical problem which faces the Treasury and the Government in selling bonds to the public. Bonds which go into banking institutions are highly inflationary, whereas bonds which are sold to the public are not inflationary, at least not immediately, although they may be so ultimately. If we are to sell Government bonds to the public we must give the public some assurance that there will not be a further cut in the value of the dollar, and that 10 years from now they will not be paid in 50-cent or 55-cent dollars as compared with the present value of the dollar.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Do I correctly understand that in December $300,000,000 worth more bonds were sold by the public than were sold to the public?

Mr. BRIDGES. I know that during the past few months the public has sold more of its bond holdings than it has purchased. It is a very substantial amount, although I do not know the exact amount.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I think the figure which was mentioned was $300,000,000. I am not sure of the exact figure.

Mr. BRIDGES. That figure may be about correct. During my colloquy with the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin with reference to an efficiency committee, the distingushed Senator from Idaho [Mr. WELKER] called my attention to the fact that I did not make it clear that the committee I had in mind would be an efficiency committee of the Senate, which would be appointed by the Senate, controlled by the Senate, and staffed by the Senate. I wanted to make that point perfectly clear.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, it occurs to me that the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER] has pointed up the danger in the whole picture which the able Senator from New Hampshire has been describing, namely, that whenever we reach a point at which the redemption of bonds by the public exceeds the amount of bonds which the public is buying, we are heading for disaster. It is not a condition in which our country should find itself when it is probably facing a heavy demand for defense expenditures.

Mr. BRIDGES. I may point out to the Senator from South Dakota and the Senator from Ohio that we have a debt limit today of $275,000,000,000, and that with the present rate of spending we shall approach the problem of what we are to do with the debt limit. We will be faced with that problem at some time in the months ahead. It is something to which the Senate of the United States, and certainly the President, should give attention. The problem is clearly stated by the Senator from Ohio, the Senator from South Dakota, and the Senator from Massachusetts, and it is certainly an alarming situation.

Mr. BRICKER. If we were to appropriate the $16,000,000,000 requested by the President and not increase taxes, it would bring the debt limit to within $3,000,000,000 of the limit fixed by Congress. Is that correct?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is not only correct, but my computation is that we would exceed the limit under such circumstances.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it not a fact that, in addition to what the Senator from Ohio has said, if we took into consideration the obligations which were authorized, the debt limit would be exceeded?

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes; it would be exceeded by a very substantial amount.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In other words, we could not meet such obligations under existing law unless we raised taxes or took some other action.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Simply stated, the point which the Senator from New Hampshire is making is that if he received a bill from a store for goods purchased, we will say, by a member of his family, and the bill was for $90, but it listed items for only $20, with no justification or any itemization for the remaining $70, the Senator would immediately return the bill to the store, or would ask his son, or whoever had bought the goods, what the charge of $70 was for. Congress is requested to appropriate $94,000,000,000 with only $20,000,000,000 being itemized.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Congress is asked to appropriate $94,000,000,000 without knowing in detail the items for which the $94,000,000,000 is being asked, and without any justification attached to the request for that amount.

Mr. BRIDGES. Of course, the President indicated that he would send the justifications later. At the moment we are asked to do it blindly.

The distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] raised the point earlier about an efficiency committee of the Senate.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I wish to elaborate a little on my suggestion.

Take, for example, the broad subject of procurement. There are many rumors about 5 percenters, and even 10 percenters. There is a great deal of waste. We have had what someone has called a champagne army. Of 100,000 members, only 20,000 are in the front lines. That is a matter of procurement which really should be gone into by the legislative branch, because we are living in a new period. An analysis of the taxpayer's dollar is called for. I was glad to note the other day that General Marshall claimed that he had found two or three more divisions. In other words, he is rearranging the old ratio of 20,000 to 80,000.

I trust the efficiency committee may be a permanent organization under the legislative branch. It would enable us to have year-around supervision of the Department of Agriculture. I remember that when I came to the Senate we were appropriating $1,300,000,000 for the Department of Agriculture, and I was getting about 3½ cents for the milk produced on my farm. In government we have created many unusual appendages which are not necessary, especially now, when the challenge is to our very existence.

It seems to me that what we ought to think about is putting this plan into operation immediately, so as to begin a real check on executive spending. I should like to see some members of the Appropriations Committee, as well as members of the Committee on Finance, go into the mechanics of the operation so as to have the committee legally established. It should get to work immediately. I think the country would praise such an effort. I think it would result in a saving of billions of dollars. It would not affect the efficiency of government. It would affect what I think is the opposite in government. The Senator knows that there are departments and agencies of the Government whose heads are dependent for their salaries on the number of people they employ.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is a very sad state of affairs, but it is true.

Mr. WILEY. So there is a temptation to feed in new employees. Every day we hear about businessmen going to the departments and seeing folks sitting around doing nothing. This is no time for doing nothing. This is a time for action.

Mr. BRIDGES. I thank the Senator. He is quite correct.

This morning another Senator called my attention to the wasted manpower involved in driving the huge black limousines belonging to all the bureaucrats in town. We find them at every social gathering. We find them in front of the Senate Office Building, the Capitol Building, and other buildings, with liveried chauffeurs waiting.

Mr. WILEY. Will the Senator make it clear that no Senator is provided one?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct. I think the only Senators who are provided with a limousine are the distinguished President pro tempore, the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished minority leader. Aside from these, other Senators drive their Fords, Plymouths, and Chevrolets themselves.

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. BRICKER. As I understand, there is pending in the House at the present time a joint resolution providing for a system of cataloging Government property, equipment, and supplies. Has the Senator given any study to that proposal?

Mr. BRIDGES. Not any detailed study; but to my mind it is one of the things which would bring about appreciable savings.

Mr. BRICKER. So that one department of the Government would know what the other departments of the Government had on hand.

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes.

Mr. BRICKER. For example, at the present time we find the Navy buying things which the Army has sold. The Navy is paying about three or four times the price at which the goods were sold by the Army. I have seen instances of such things charged in the public press. They have also been brought to the attention of the Senate.

We find Mr. Brannan not taking care of all supplies under his supervision in the Surplus Commodity Corporation to the point where they are not even available, desirable, or acceptable by the Army. I believe that a system of that kind, under which each department would know about what other Government departments had, and what department to go to to get certain things without paying double prices after they had been sold at a cheap price by the other department, would be a logical step to take.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I infer from what the Senator from Ohio has said that the Secretary of Agriculture had certain commodities which were packaged in such a manner that the Department of the Army could not use them. I think it might be well for the RECORD, to point out that the Secretary of Agriculture is the one who outlines the specifications, both for his procurement agencies and for the procurement agencies of the Army. The fact that he is outlining the procurement requirements differently for his own agencies than those for the Army is the reason why the two cannot be put together. In other words, the same man is making different regulations for the several procurement agencies.

Mr. BRIDGES. It is a very startling thing which the Senator from Delaware has said, but I know that the distinguished Senator from Delaware is always accurate and thorough in his statements and investigations. Therefore, his statement must be accepted as a fact. It is a shocking thing to have a member of the President's Cabinet performing in such a manner.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Speaking of the waste in the appropriation bill, we are often told, as the Senator from New Hampshire knows, that the untouchables in the bill, particularly in time of war, are the items for military requirements. If a Senator speaks against such items, he is charged with speaking against the boys in Korea. But I might point out how that in the appropriation bill about $500,000,000 is to cover up the stupidity of one of our Government agencies, which, about a year ago, had on hand 250,000,000 pounds of wool. It was declared surplus, nonessential, and sold. During the past 3 or 4 weeks wool has been declared to be an essential commodity for war. The Government is now going to buy it back, and the taxpayer will lose about $550,000,000 in the transaction. This is only one of many examples.

Mr. BRIDGES. That is a typical instance. I might point out that during the past 5 or 6 years, time after time in the Appropriations Committee or in the Armed Services Committee, I have raised the question with the military and civilian personnel of the Defense Establishment, as to whether or not we should declare surplus many of the things which they declared surplus. Always the reply was, in essence, "That is beyond our obvious needs." With the international situation as critical as it is, the question I asked was, "General—" or "Mr. Secretary, do you really believe that?" The reply would be, "That is true to the best of our knowledge."

Now we find that the first time the Army came to the Appropriations Committee after the Korean incident, it asked among other things, for millions of dollars for uniforms. When World War II ended we had uniforms for 15,000,000 American citizens who were serving in the armed services, and we had reserve stocks all over the country and all over the world. Yet when we got into what the President termed a "police action" in Korea, within the first few days, the Army asked for money to buy uniforms.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator from New Hampshire know what has become of the uniforms we had?

Mr. BRIDGES. I assume that they were declared surplus and sold. I know that a young boy who is a neighbor of mine went to a so-called Army and Navy store and bought a Navy peajacket for $6. I have not looked up the figures but I would guess that it would cost the Navy somewhere between $25 and $30 to replace that fine woolen peajacket. That is something that could be stored. Underwear could be stored. Perhaps there are certain materials which might be subject to rust and deterioration if they were left standing outdoors. But why we did not have some things ready when this crisis hit us, when we had the largest, most powerful Military Establishment in the world 5 years ago, is more than I have been able to learn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BRIDGES. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is not the Senator aware of the fact that as recently as within the past 60 days we have had the spectacle of one Government agency selling as surplus certain commodities at a fraction of their cost, while at the same time the Government, through another agency, was buying identically the same commodities in the open market? For instance, a short time ago the Government was selling 100,000,000 pounds of butter as surplus to Italy at 15 cents a pound, while the Army was buying butter at around 75 cents a pound?

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes. And I remember what the distinguished Senator from Delaware brought out with respect to two or three other commodities. I think the Senator has rendered a very patriotic service by exposing what has taken place in that regard.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is the Senator aware of the fact that even as of today the Government has listed as surplus and nonessential—that is the description the Government has put on it—100,000,000 bushels of wheat which is being offered in the international market with the understanding that it cannot be resold to American citizens? This is being done at a time when everyone recognizes that wheat is an essential commodity in time of war. That is, everyone recognizes that fact except Mr. Brannan. I sometimes think that the Government is deliberately trying to force the country under controls by artificially promoting higher prices. The complete failure to coordinate their procurement requirements cannot all be classified as stupidity. Is the Senator aware of these surplus sales?

Mr. BRIDGES. What the Senator says is not all new to me, for it is along the line of what has been occurring. I will say to the Senator from Delaware that I was interested to note the other day that now, when Nehru and India have crossed us up and done everything they could to muddy the waters, so far as the far-eastern situation is concerned, we are proposing to ship vast quantities of food to India. I am perfectly willing to help the starving people of the world, but I should like to have the people we help at least be friendly and cooperative with us.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the event we go through with that program, is it not more than likely that we will be buying, in the market, at high prices, some of the same commodities we are now giving away, or selling cheap under the classification of "surplus"?

Mr. BRIDGES. I think that is undoubtedly true. That has been the history of such transactions.

Mr. President, I think it should be clear to the Senate and also should be clear to the American people the kind of budget the President has proposed. Either this is a critical situation or it is not. Either we have a grave international crisis or we have not. Either we need to keep the national budget at the lowest possible figure in order to provide adequate national defense and retain our solvency and stability, or we do not. I think the time has come for people to stand up and be counted on these issues. As the weeks roll on I hope the Senate of the United States will give very serious attention to this rather blind, complicated budget which for the first time I know of in history has been sent to Congress without complete justification.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, who is so expert in appropriation matters, whether he believes that it would be entirely feasible, without injuring any essential feature of the Government, military or otherwise, to reduce the size of the budget by, say, from $5,000,000,000 to $3,000,000,000?

Mr. BRIDGES. I will have to answer the Senator in this way: I have seen justification for only $20,000,000,000 of the budget estimates. If I were to undertake to answer, I would be operating in the dark, just as the President is operating in the dark in submitting the budget to Congress. But on the basis of reasonable common sense, I think a very substantial saving of several billion dollars could be made in the budget. I will say, however, that I cannot point out the specific items all down the line, because they have not been submitted or justified.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The Senator would like to see a budget first?

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the body of the RECORD immediately following the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], a table which shows a breakdown of the $71,500,000,000 budget of the President, which was recently submitted. The breakdown is by States, showing in one column the allocations of the proportionate part to be paid by each State, and in another column is shown the amount of taxes collected from each of the States for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1950. The table shows what the budget means to each of the States and how much extra taxes will be required unless something is done to reduce this waste and nonessential spending.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

State	Total internal revenue collections for fiscal year ended June 30, 1950 [1]	Proportionate part to be paid toward the $71,500,000,000 [2]
Alabama	$233,208,454	$429,000,000
Arizona	74,822,094	135,850,000

NOMINATION OF HERBERT I. HINDS

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, as in executive session, I report favorably from the Committee on Finance the nomination of Herbert I. Hinds, of Tahlequah, Okla., to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Oklahoma, in place of Henry Clifford Jones, resigned, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, am I to understand that the reason the Senator from Oklahoma is asking for immediate consideration of the nomination is that, unless confirmation is had immediately, a vacancy will result because the Senator from Oklahoma will not be present on Thursday to move that the nomination be confirmed?

Mr. KERR. That is correct. I understand the Senate will not be in session tomorrow, and my present plans will take me away from the Senate on Thursday and Friday. In order that no vacancy may be created when the resignation of the present collector takes effect and before a new collector may be qualified to take his place I ask unanimous consent that the nomination be confirmed at this time.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I understand that the Senator's colleagues on the committee are in favor of the confirmation of the nomination and that the report which he presents is the unanimous report of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KERR. That is correct.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I reserved the right to object because I know it is the policy of the minority leader—and it is a good policy, I may say—not to consent to unanimous-consent requests for immediate consideration of nominations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed, and the President will be notified.

CITATION OF JOSEPH DOTO FOR CONTEMPT

The Senate resumed consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 43), which is as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate certify the report of the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate as to the refusal of Joseph Doto to answer a series of questions before the said special committee, together with all the facts in connection therewith, under the seal of the United States Senate, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said Joseph Doto may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

Mr. KEFAUVER obtained the floor.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me so I may suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. NEELY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] to refer the resolution (S. Res. 43) to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report it back to the Senate within 1 week.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I believe the yeas and nays have already been ordered on this question; am I correct?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield the floor.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I have not had an opportunity to read all of the seven cases which have been filed by the committee. I have picked up the record in the case which was discussed yesterday, and I picked up the next record which happened to come to my hand. I desire to read to the Senate the law on the subject as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Blau against the United States, decided in December 1950. The decision is quite brief, it is by Mr. Justice Black, and I think it is to the point, as Senators will observe when they listen to the testimony of the witness as I shall read it later on.

The petitioner was adjudged guilty of contempt of court for refusing, on the ground of possible self-incrimination, to answer certain questions before a Federal grand jury and later before a Federal district court. The court of appeals affirmed—

And so forth. Mr. Justice Black delivered the opinion of the Court, which is as follows:

In response to a subpena, petitioner appeared as a witness before the United States district court grand jury at Denver, Colo. There she was asked several questions concerning the Communist Party of Colorado and her employment by it. Petitioner refused to answer these questions on the ground that the answers might tend to incriminate her. She was then taken before the district judge, where the questions were again propounded, and where she again claimed her constitutional privilege against self-incrimination, and refused to testify. The district judge found the petitioner guilty of contempt of court and sentenced her to imprisonment for 1 year. The Court of Appeals of the Tenth Circuit affirmed.

We granted certiorari because the decision appeared to deny rights guaranteed by the fifth amendment. The holding below also was in conflict with the recent decisions of the fifth and ninth circuits.

At the time petitioner was called before the grand jury the Smith Act was on the statute books making it a crime, among other things, to advocate knowingly the desirability of overthrow of the Government by force and violence, to organize or help to organize any society or group which teaches, advocates, or encourages such overthrow of the Government, or to be or become a member of such a group with knowledge of its purposes.

These provisions made future prosecution of petitioner far more than a mere imaginary possibility. She reasonably could fear that criminal charges might be brought against her if she admitted employment by the Communist Party or intimate knowledge of its workings. Whether such admissions by themselves would support a conviction under a criminal statute is immaterial. Answers to the questions asked by the grand jury would have furnished a link in the chain of evidence needed in a prosecution of petitioner for violation (or conspiracy to violate) the Smith Act. Prior decisions of this court have clearly established that under such circumstances the Constitution gives a witness the privilege of remaining silent.

Mr. President, let me read the record that is made in this case. It is very interesting. I have before me the case which was presented by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] on yesterday. Here is a witness by the name of Doto. He is put upon the stand by the committee of which the Senator from Tennessee is the chairman. Here is what he said, preliminary to everything else:

I wish to state clearly why I feel that I should assert and rely upon my constitutional privileges to refuse to be a witness against myself.

I do this to explain the circumstances of my refusal to answer certain questions and to produce certain books and records.

At the present time criminal charges and investigations are proceeding against me in the State of New Jersey. Such charges have also been presented against me in the State of New York. The Federal Government is engaged in an extensive investigation of my tax returns, and of all income I have from any source.

It has been announced that my tax returns have been made available to this committee, and in turn this committee has, according to statements in the newspapers, published and disclosed numerous figures purporting to be my income. Statements have been repeatedly made by members and representatives of the Federal Government that I am a member of a Nation-wide crime syndicate.

A few months ago the Federal Government issued a statement that every United States attorney in the country had been alerted to compile information to be used against me. The newspapers have carried statements purporting to emanate from the committee that it is the purpose of the committee to get various people by bringing them before this committee and questioning them in such a way that they would either give evidence which could be used against them or subject themselves to prosecution for perjury or contempt.

Under these circumstances, I feel that my presence and testimony here are not sought for any assistance I can give this committee in formulating legislation, but for the purpose of obtaining from me some statements which might be used against me in further prosecution.

For these reasons I respectfully claim the right not to aid the Government directly or indirectly in prosecuting me. That is my reasons.

Mr. President, I picked up another report. I had time only to go into two of the reports, and here is another one. It is before the Senate and is available to all Senators. In this case the statement is by counsel for a witness who was under subpena. The counsel is Mr. Selser, and he said:

I represent Mr. Moretti in two proceedings presently pending, one in the State of New Jersey, and one in the State of New York.

Presently, Mr. Moretti is under complaint in New Jersey awaiting action of the grand jury in that State in that county. His bail presently is $15,000, and we applied to the court in New Jersey for leave to depart the jurisdiction of the court, modifying the bail accordingly, so that we might appear before this committee today.

I take it that there are certain inquiries to be made by this committee, answers to which may tend to incriminate this defendant, and he, on my advice, will exercise the privileges which are granted him under the fifth amendment to the Constitution, and refuse to answer such questions.

I anticipate, too, that there may be some interrogation with regard to income-tax returns made. These returns, as I am informed, have been made available to this committee by some act of the President.

With regard to these things or matters which were set up in such returns, I shall advise Mr. Moretti not to answer on the ground not only of self-incrimination but, perhaps, on the ground, too, that it is not the function of this committee to inquire into matters relating to income-tax returns or liabilities.

I return, Mr. President, to the last word on the subject issued by the Supreme Court of the United States in December of last year, which I read to the Senate. Mr. Justice Black said:

She reasonably could fear that criminal charges might be brought against her if she admitted employment by the Communist Party or intimate knowledge of its workings. Whether such admissions by themselves would support a conviction under a criminal statute is immaterial. Answers to the questions asked by the grand jury would have furnished a link in the chain of evidence needed in prosecution of petitioner for violation or conspiracy to violate the Smith Act.

In other words, Mr. President, a serious question is presented which I do not think should be disposed of lightly. I do not believe the Senate wants to depart from the law, and I think a question of law is raised very seriously as to whether the witness is contumacious. Whether she has been guilty of contempt seems to me to be serious in the light of the record. I think the matter should go to the Judiciary Committee for study and report.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, if I may be heard very briefly, I should like to say, first, that the Blau case which has just been referred to by the distinguished Senator from Nevada involved a refusal to answer on the ground that the fact that the person was a Communist might incriminate the witness of violation of the Smith Act, being a Communist would probably be a direct violation of the Smith Act. The Supreme Court properly held, I think, that answers to the questions asked by the grand jury would have furnished a link in the chain of evidence needed in a prosecution of petitioner for violation of the Smith Act. It would have furnished a link.

With regard to self-incrimination, the first thing is that a Federal offense must be involved. That has, of course, been settled in the case of United States v. Murdock (284 U. S. 143). The point about the answering of this witness and the other witnesses is that this witness refused to answer merely on the ground of an arbitrary refusal. He even refused to testify whether he had ever heard of some person; whether he had ever seen anyone or not. Yesterday I read a great many of the questions and answers into the RECORD. They could have had nothing to do with any possible Federal offense. Certainly there could be no connection with any Federal offense if he admitted having been to a place or having seen certain people or having heard of certain people. Further along in the hearing he was asked about some legitimate businesses. Gambling is not an offense under a Federal statute, and, therefore, he would have no right to refuse to testify about gambling transactions. In addition to the statements which I read into the RECORD yesterday afternoon, I should like to read two or three more to prove the point. He was asked:

Have you ever heard of the Illinois Trade Association?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer on the ground it might tend to incriminate me.

Mr. HALLEY. Have you ever had any business dealings with the Illinois Trade Association?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer on the ground it might tend to incriminate me.

Mr. HALLEY. Have you ever heard of the Kings County Buick Co.?

Mr. DOTO. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALLEY. Have you ever had any business dealings with them?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer on the grounds that it might tend to incriminate me.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] asked him several questions with respect to whether or not he had kept any books or any records, and he said:

I decline to answer on the ground that it might incriminate me.

On page 12 it will be found that he was asked whether he had any business dealings with quite a number of people. He declined to answer on the ground that it might tend to incriminate him. It might tend to incriminate him if he were to answer whether he ever had any morphine or narcotic business relationships with certain people. However, it is presumed that a business relationship would be a legal relationship.

On page 13 he was asked:

Did you know Virginia Hill?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer.

He was asked whether he had bought a race horse, or whether anyone had bought a race horse for him. That would not be an illegal transaction. He declined to answer. He was asked whether he had had any business transactions in the State of Nevada. He declined to answer. Certainly no one would contend that having a business transaction in the State of Nevada would be something which would incriminate a witness.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. What was the purpose of asking those questions?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The purpose, of course, was to find out what his associations were, whether he had infiltrated into any legitimate businesses and many of the questions were to secure answers which would fit into a large picture of interstate transactions which the committee is developing.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Was the Senator making inquiry into legitimate businesses?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes and we were making inquiry to find out what criminal activity in interstate commerce he had participated in.

Mr. MILLIKIN. But the Senator's purpose in asking the questions was to link him with criminal activities; was it not?

Mr. KEFAUVER. To find out how criminal activities operated in interstate commerce. However, the purpose of asking the questions had nothing to do with his income tax. I have been advised by some Treasury Department officials that his income tax was not under investigation.

He was asked if he had ever known Vincent Aiello. He said: "Yes, sir."

He was asked how long he had known him. He said:

Twenty years or so.

Mr. HALLEY. Have you ever had any business dealings with him?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer on the grounds it might tend to incriminate me.

Mr. HALLEY. Now, do you know Paul Bonadio?

Mr. DOTO. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALLEY. Is he not the vice president and treasurer of the Automotive Conveying Co. of New Jersey?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer on the ground it might tend to incriminate me.

* * * * *

Mr. HALLEY. Has he ever worked for you?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer on the ground it might tend to incriminate me.

Mr. HALLEY. Is he not an officer of the Automotive Conveying Co., of New Jersey?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer on the ground it might tend to incriminate me.

He was asked whether he had ever seen certain people. He declined to answer whether he had seen some 15 or 16 people.

He was further asked whether he had heard of certain people. He refused to answer.

He was asked:

Did you conduct any business in New Jersey?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer on the ground it might tend to incriminate me.

Mr. HALLEY. Did you ever have any business in Habana?

There had been some discussion about some business in Habana.

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer on the ground it might tend to incriminate me.

I cannot see how having had any business dealings in Cuba would be a violation of any statute of the United States.

He was asked:

Did you ever hear of the G. & R. Trading Co.?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer on the ground it might tend to incriminate me.

He declined to answer whether he had ever heard of quite a number of companies.

He was asked:

Have you ever had any investments in Las Vegas, Nev.?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer on the ground it might tend to incriminate me.

He was asked whether he knew what the numbers business was, and he declined to answer.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. The last part of the resolution which the Senator proposes, after stating that the record shall be certified to the United States district attorney, states "to the end that said Joseph Doto may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law." I wonder if the Senator can give us an expression as to whether or not the certification of the record to the district attorney is a mandate to him to prosecute under the contempt citation, or whether the certification puts the matter in the hands of the district attorney so that he will then have the responsibility of determining whether or not a contempt has been committed and action should be started?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The code in section 194, title II, says after providing for certification of the matter to the United States district attorney, "whose duty it shall be to bring the matter before the grand jury for its action." Therefore, if the matter is certified to him he has the duty of bringing it before the grand jury for whatever action the grand jury may wish to take upon it. Of course, if the district attorney feels that the case is not sound he can and should so advise the grand jury.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. The grand jury may then either bring a charge of contempt or refuse to bring a charge.

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is correct. If the grand jury returned an indictment, it would come before a judge and jury.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. My recollection is that I read in the newspapers that Joe Doto had been indicted in New Jersey on a charge of maintaining a gambling establishment. Does the Senator know whether that is correct?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I am sorry, but I could not hear the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. I was asking the Senator from Tennessee whether this man was indicted by a grand jury in New Jersey on another charge. I recall reading in one of the newspapers, although I do not know whether it was in last evening's paper or in this morning's paper, something to that effect.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I did not see it in the newspaper, and I do not know whether he has been indicted for gambling in New Jersey. I do know that Mr. Parsons, attorney general for the State of New Jersey, and Nelson Stamler, his assistant, have the matter under consideration and that they have been very diligent in going into their activities.

Reading further from the testimony:

Mr. HALLEY. We won't talk about your gambling now. Let us talk about gambling, in general, in New Jersey. What do you know, if anything, about gambling?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer on the ground that it might tend to incriminate me.

Mr. HALLEY. What have you heard that you can tell this committee that would be of help in assisting this committee in its investigation?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer on the ground that it might tend to incriminate me.

* * * * *

Mr. HALLEY. Do you know anything about the bookmaking business?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer on the ground that it might tend to incriminate me.

Another question was:

Mr. HALLEY. Have you ever heard of a lay-off bet?

Mr. DOTO. I decline to answer on the ground that it might tend to incriminate me.

Mr. President, it is fantastic that a person called before a congressional committee, on his own statement—which should not be given too much credit by Members of the Senate, in view of this man's record—could sit there and defy the committee and refuse to answer a question as to whether he had ever even seen someone or heard of him, or whether he had ever had any business transaction in Habana, Cuba. Unless we can do something with a criminal with a notorious record, who has defied law-enforcement officers for a long time, as he admits in his own testimony, and bring him before a Senate committee and at least refer the matter to a grand jury, it is certainly going to be a great deal of encouragement and comfort to people like Joe Adonis in their further operations.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. So as to clear the record, yesterday the Senator from Michigan asked the Senator from Tennessee a question, and he believed he got an answer to the effect that this resolution would, in fact, be an opinion by the Senate that the particular witness was guilty of contempt of the Senate. When the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] asked his question, I was not sure that the answer yesterday was as the Senator from Michigan understood it. I should like to propound a question.

If this resolution is passed by the Senate, will it be a determination by the Senate that this particular person is guilty of contempt of the Senate?

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is correct. That is my interpretation.

Mr. FERGUSON. Then what is left for the district attorney to do on the question of contempt of the Senate? Is there anything left for the district attorney to do?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes. The district attorney then presents the matter to the grand jury, and the grand jury decides whether or not, in its opinion, there was contempt.

Mr. FERGUSON. Then can the grand jury declare that the witness is guilty of contempt without the Senate declaring that he is guilty by the action it takes?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I believe that under the statute it may be possible for a district attorney, on the ground that the contempt is a misdemeanor, to himself present it to the grand jury and ask for an indictment for a misdemeanor. That is not entirely clear. However, there can be no question as to the propriety of the procedure we are following here today. It is a certification that we think he is guilty of contempt; and the district attorney presents it to the grand jury for its action.

Mr. FERGUSON. So, as I understand, if the Senate did not adopt this resolution, a grand jury could not indict for contempt of the Senate on the basis of these answers.

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is correct, in my opinion, in these cases. But as I said before there is a possibility of another course of action.

Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] suggested that we obtain a letter from the committee counsel to the effect that he had studied the matter and had advised the committee, which took unanimous action, that refusal to answer these questions was contemptuous. I have a memorandum to that effect, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point. I want to say that in Rudolph Halley, our chief counsel and his associates that we have most excellent counsel in whom we have confidence and upon whom we can rely.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE ORGANIZED CRIME IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE (PURSUANT TO S. RES. 202, 81ST CONG.), JANUARY 22, 1951

MEMORANDUM TO SENATOR ESTES KEFAUVER, CHAIRMAN, RE CONTEMPT OF JOSEPH DOTO, ALIAS JOE ADONIS

I have examined the record of the testimony of Joseph Doto, alias Joe Adonis in addition to hearing it at the time it was given and it is my opinion, which has previously been conveyed to the committee, that the refusal by Joseph Doto, alias Joe Adonis to answer questions was contemptuous of the United States Senate and its Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce.

As chief counsel of the committee, with the advice and concurrence of the committee's legal staff, I have advised the committee and now certify that the contempts complained of are, in my opinion, punishable as a matter of law. In those instances where the witness asserted a claim of privilege, it is my opinion that the claim was not made in good faith inasmuch as there was no reasonable relationship between the question asked and in line of proof which might incriminate the witness under any Federal statute.

In certifying contempt proceedings, this committee and its counsel have carefully distinguished between refusals to answer based on an arbitrary or fanciful claim of privilege from refusals to answer questions where a claim of privilege might be raised with even a minimum possibility that the witness might be incriminated under any of the laws of the United States.

RUDOLPH HALLEY,
Chief Counsel.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I believe the yeas and nays have already been ordered.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I shall be very brief. I happen to be a member of the special committee appointed to investigate interstate crime, or crime in interstate commerce, and I have attended a number of its meetings throughout the country.

No man could be a member of that committee and go through the experiences which the committee has gone through without having within him a very deep and righteous indignation because criminals in this country have played ducks and drakes with the Government, both State and National.

The committee was appointed, and it chose eminent counsel, who have done a faithful and expert job as our legal advisers. They have given their best in time and effort to uncover the facts.

These men of the underworld, these gangsters, the scum of the earth—we can name them ad seriatim, if necessary; the names, too numerous to mention, are in the record—come before us, and when examined in open session of the committee or in executive session, they decline to answer on the ground that it might incriminate them. They have refused to answer questions so simple and so far removed from anything that might interfere with the doing of justice that I simply cannot understand the plan suggested by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN].

The Committee on the Judiciary is an estimable committee, and the chairman himself is highly esteemed. So is the Select Committee on Crime of the Senate highly esteemed, with an able chairman in ESTES KEFAUVER, of Tennessee, who has done noble work. I will not speak of every member of the committee, save to say that I pay tribute to each one of them, and am proud to be associated with them.

I watched the witnesses in action, snapping their fingers at the Senate committee, which is a segment of the United States Senate. In my judgment, when we take action to delay this procedure, and refer the matter to the Committee on the Judiciary, what we are doing, in the last analysis, is giving aid and comfort to Public Enemies Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 on down the line. We are aiding and abetting in an indirect way, crooks and gangsters, the scum of the earth. Let us stand up and be counted. Let us trust the committee appointed by the Senate to investigate crime. It has been through great vicissitudes.

I have a deep conviction that justice should not be subverted and contravened. Let these men know that the righteous indignation of the Senate and of the country in general will have its day in court. I say do not delay. Trust ESTES KEFAUVER. Show Joe Doto or Joe Adonis who evaded a subpena month after month, that we mean business. Show these men, the scum of the earth, the gangsters of the country, that the Senate of the United States demands quick and speedy responses to questions from the committee. Counsel for the committee has submitted a legal opinion, which is now a part of the record.

I bespeak action, and confidence and trust in the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I have great respect for the Committee on the Judiciary and for its able chairman. I do not believe that we have better lawyers in the Senate or in the United States than are to be found among its members. One of the able members is the chairman of the Kefauver special committee. It seems to me that the question which the Senate must decide is whether or not it proposes to protect the jurisdiction of the Senate and the jurisdiction of its legally established committees, authorized and directed to go into vital public matters and to see that that objective and purpose is not overturned and defeated by the refusal of persons to testify, whether those persons be of high or low estate.

Yesterday the Senator from Florida suggested to the Senator from Tennessee that he thought the proper course would be to have able counsel for the committee—and the committee has able counsel, paid out of the contingent funds of the Senate to protect the committee in its functioning—submit a certificate to be filed with the report in this case, stating that counsel have made a specific examination of the records in this particular case and have found that the conditions and details required to be present before contempt proceedings may be brought and sustained are actually present.

That suggestion was made in good faith, and I am happy that the Senator from Tennessee has received it as made in good faith, and has followed it by securing such a certificate, which is now filed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate, to the effect that the able attorneys secured to protect the Senate in the exercise of its jurisdiction have examined this particular record and have certified that in their judgment all the elements necessary to support a successful prosecution for contempt of the Senate are present.

Mr. President, the question is, it seems to me, whether or not the Senate is going to proceed so as to maintain its own jurisdiction, to protect its own functioning, to protect its own special committee set up to do a job here, which has now reported that its purpose to do a job in this field has been thwarted by the failure and refusal of sundry witnesses to answer questions; and that those witnesses—as the committee counsel has reported—were not justified in falling back on their constitutional right in their refusal and failure and declination to answer these particular questions.

If the Senate wants to send these matters up to the trial court to pass upon each of these questions as they come in, the Senate will be wasting a great deal of its time in first passing upon them in detail. I think the Senate at some time must rely on somebody to do a good job, and I think we have done that here by functioning through an able committee whose decision is now upheld and supported by the letter filed by counsel for the committee.

Mr. President, I am not in accord with the statements which have been made here that the adoption of the resolution would require the district attorney to do something if upon inspection of the record he found that part of it or all of it or any of it would fly in the face of Supreme Court opinions or decisions, or in the face of the mandate of the Constitution or the statute law of our Nation. To the contrary, as I understand it, I think this action is a necessary step to certify and get over into the hands of the prosecuting officer the record of what has been done by the committee and what was done by this witness in his refusal to answer many, many questions.

Let us assume, Mr. President, that answers to some of the questions could properly have been refused by the witness on the ground that to answer would be to furnish against himself testimony of crime. I have read the questions and answers as shown by the report. I would be less than frank if I did not say that I think some of the questions and answers are subject to that sort of a decision. There are others of the questions and answers which, as viewed by the Senator from Florida, are subject at least to question as to whether they are pertinent, as to whether they pertain accurately to the objectives and the purposes of the investigation. Mr. President, there are many, many of these questions and answers which are not subject, at least prima facie, as read by the Senator from Florida, to either of those objections, but which do present an obstinate and willful refusal on the part of the witness to subject himself to the jurisdiction of the Senate and to make possible the fulfillment of the very worthy objectives sought to be attained by the Senate when it adopted the resolution and clothed the special committee with the authority to subpena and examine witnesses and place them under oath, to take testimony, and utilize generally the powers of the Senate given in such matters.

Mr. President, I very strongly hope that the Senate will not here lay down a precedent of having to submit such a matter to any one committee, no matter how good, because many Members of the Senate sit upon committees which are doing vital work for the Nation and which have counsel and which have the right at least, as the Senator from Florida sees it, to report to the Senate when their jurisdiction is being flouted, and when the dignity of the Senate is being flouted.

The Committee on the Judiciary is already the most overworked committee in the Senate. There is no requirement whatever that the Committee on the Judiciary shall have to go into any or all of these matters. It would, of course, be required to go into matters occurring before it or before one of its subcommittees, but not into matters which have happened before other committees of the Senate or subcommittees of other committees of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. What is there to hinder the chairman of the special committee from turning the matter over to the district attorney to do as he sees fit, without putting the Senate on the spot, so to speak, by passing upon the matter?

Mr. HOLLAND. I am not able to answer that question except to say that I understand that the resolution is in the form which has been adopted and followed in the past. I am advised that the resolution is in the standard form followed by the Senate in pursuance of protecting its jurisdiction.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD at this point the two sections of the Code of the United States upon which this proceeding is based, at least as understood by the Senator from Florida, namely, section 192 and section 194 of title II. If there are other sections which incidentally are involved I shall be very happy to have them placed in the RECORD also.

There being no objection, the sections were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEC. 192. Refusal of witness to testify: Every person who having been summoned as a witness by the authority of either House of Congress to give testimony or to produce papers upon any matter under inquiry before either House, or any joint committee established by a joint or concurrent resolution of the two Houses of Congress, or any committee of either House of Congress, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the question under inquiry, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000 nor less than $100 and imprisonment in a common jail for not less than 1 month nor more than 12 months. (R. S., sec. 102; June 22, 1938, ch. 594, 52 Stat. 942.)

* * * * *

SEC. 194. Witnesses failing to testify or produce records: Whenever a witness summoned as mentioned in section 192 of this title fails to appear to testify or fails to produce any books, papers, records, or documents, as required, or whenever any witness so summoned refuses to answer any question pertinent to the subject under inquiry before either House, or any joint committee established by a joint or concurrent resolution of the two Houses of Congress, or any committee or subcommittee of either House of Congress, and the fact of such failure or failures is reported to either House while Congress is in session, or when Congress is not in session, a statement of fact constituting such failure is reported to and filed with the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House, it shall be the duty of the said President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House, as the case may be, to certify, and he shall so certify, the statement of facts aforesaid under the seal of the Senate or House, as the case may be, to the appropriate United States attorney, whose duty it shall be to bring the matter before the grand jury for its action. R. S. sec. 104; July 13, 1946, ch. 884, 49 Stat. 2041; June 22, 1938, ch. 594, 52 Stat. 942.)

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I call to the attention of the Senate that it is provided under these two sections of the code that not only activities before any Senate committee, but also before a subcommittee duly authorized, can fall within the purview of the law.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. I asked the Senator to yield for the purpose of asking a question of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] who just now submitted a question to the Senator from Florida. The distinguished Senator from South Carolina raised the question why the subject matter could not be turned over to the district attorney for such action as he shall see fit, instead of leaving it to the action of the Senate. In answer to that question, I would in turn ask: Is not the Senate of the United States sufficiently able and distinguished to judge of such a matter as this? Shall the dignity of the Senate of the United States be flouted? Shall the Senate turn over to the district attorney a duty which its own self-respect tells it should be performed by its own duly appointed committee? We should in no uncertain terms, I will say to the Senator from South Carolina, and of which I wish him to take notice, assert our own self-respect in this matter.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire and appreciate his contribution.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. We who owe allegiance to the law must always be very careful to see that the law is carefully followed. No matter what other crimes a man may be guilty of, when he is accused of having committed a particular crime, we should take great care to ascertain that that crime has been committed, and that the punishment to be meted out shall be punishment for the particular crime committed, and not for a common or over-all violation of criminal law.

One thing which troubles the Senator from Michigan is the proposal that the matter be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. That would mean that the whole question of whether or not the questions asked of the witness are material to the proceedings must be determined by that committee. A special committee has already had the whole question assigned to it. That committee knows all the testimony which has been given respecting crimes relating to interstate commerce—testimony that could be considered later by the Senate to determine whether or not legislative acts are needed to stop crimes from being committed in interstate commerce. If the matter is turned over to the Committee on the Judiciary, the entire record must be considered by that committee in a determination as to whether or not a question is material and an answer is material to the issue before the special committee.

Yesterday I said I was desirous that the matter be considered long enough so we could give it due and careful consideration. I hope the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary will consider withdrawing his motion. The matter is one very peculiarly within the jurisdiction of a committee which has heard all the testimony. That committee must determine whether or not these questions are material and whether or not they are relevant and necessary in the proceedings.

That being true, I believe that the Judiciary Committee should not sit as an appellate court, as it were, to determine this question because, after all, the question eventually would have to come back to the Senate. Although there are 13 members of the Judiciary Committee and 5 members of the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce, even if all 18 of those Senators were to be fully satisfied as to the facts and as to the proper decision in this case, the matter still would have to return to the Senate for consideration by the remaining 78 Senators of the 96 who constitute the Senate's membership.

Therefore, Mr. President, yesterday I was anxious that at least the hearings of the special committee be printed, so that all Senators on their conscience could determine whether in fact there was contempt or was not contempt of the Senate.

If I were to have to decide about the matter today, I would have to say that I consider that some of the questions were not relevant to the issues and some were relevant to the issues as covered by the original resolution. Of course, I do not know what the actual testimony has been. However, I would say that on the basis of the resolution by which the special committee was created, some of the questions which have been referred to were relevant to the issue and should have been answered; and as to them the witness had no right to claim, as a constitutional privilege, that he was not required to answer the questions because his answers to them would tend to incriminate him.

I realize that the courts are very zealous in protecting that constitutional privilege, because no judge wishes to have any person deprived of such a constitutional right, if there is a reasonable doubt about the matter and if there are reasonable grounds for believing that the witness is entitled to that privilege.

Under the circumstances existing in the case now under consideration by the Senate, I think there are on the record of the special committee sufficient facts to show that the refusal of the witness to answer some of those questions does constitute contempt of the Senate.

With that in mind, I hope the Senator from Nevada will not insist on his motion that this matter be referred to the Judiciary Committee as an appellate body to determine whether there has actually been contempt of the Senate.

Mr. President, I wish to state that I appreciate very much the courtesy of the Senator from Florida in yielding to me, and I thank him for doing so.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Michigan for his comments, with which I am in entire accord.

In passing upon this matter, I think the Senate should be mindful of the fact that if this matter is referred to the Judiciary Committee, similar action would be required in each of the several other cases of this sort now pending, seven in all as I am advised; and then, as suggested by the distinguished Senator from Michigan, it would be necessary for the Judiciary Committee to read the record in each of those cases, before making its report on them to the Senate.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the situation with which we are confronted goes considerably farther than the matter which has just been mentioned. It seems to me it goes to the question of whether the Senate proposes to back up all of its committees which report that they are flouted and that the jurisdiction of the Senate in such matters has been flaunted, and that they have been advised by counsel that such is the case, and that they wish the record in such case certified to the Senate, for the appropriate action by the Senate itself in laying a predicate for the taking of contempt proceedings.

Mr. President, Senators who vote in opposition to the motion to refer this matter to the Judiciary Committee, and who subsequently vote in favor of the contempt resolution, will simply be voting to have this matter go to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, for examination by him, and then to go to the grand jury for the District of Columbia. If they find that the facts in the case justify action in accordance with the contempt resolution, they will act accordingly. In such circumstances we shall not be taking away from the United States attorney for the District of Columbia has jurisdiction or relieving him of his duty to advise the grand jury as to the law as it now exists.

Furthermore, by such action we shall not be taking away from the judge in the trial court or from the other judges up the line their duty to follow the law and apply it as they understand it.

By voting "nay" on the motion now before us, we shall be registering our belief that, now that the special committee has gone to the trouble to which it has gone, and has reached the report it has made, we are entitled to have the report made to the Senate, and are entitled to have the President of the Senate as our Presiding Officer properly certify to the district attorney that this matter has been formally brought to his attention, and that he is transmitting the facts as required by law; and then the proceedings will go forward in accordance with law. It certainly seems to me that the requested action should be taken.

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay the Senate in taking action on this matter. Let me say, briefly, that I hope the Senate will not approve the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

If the Members of the Senate who are not members of the special committee could have sat with it and could have observed the parade of crooks and gangsters who passed in review before the committee and said to the committee that they refused to answer questions, I do not believe any Member of the Senate would vote in favor of the motion of the distinguished Senator from Nevada.

Mr. President, I consider this matter to be very important. It seems to me that the Senate should say that it approves of the work which has been done by the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce. If the Senate does not say that, then it will say that it does not approve of the work done by the special committee and the methods used by it.

At this time, along with my colleague, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], I should like to congratulate the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], who, by and large, has handled by himself the work of the special committee. The other members of the committee have helped when they could and have attended the hearings whenever they could; but, by and large, the credit for the work done by the special committee in connection with the investigation of a number of persons who formerly were public officials, and who now have been separated from the public payrolls, goes to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. President, the special committee is about to conclude its work. Its report is due in February, and the special committee is to be discharged in March. As a member of the special committee, I shall not act in favor of a continuance of the life of the committee.

If the Senate delays this work for another week, until we have a report from the Judiciary Committee, let me say that will encourage the many crooks who are yet to appear before the special committee; such action will encourage them to act in the same way that others of their ilk have acted in the past. In other words, they refused to answer questions by the special committee. Therefore, the work of the special committee will not be completed; it will not be possible for it to complete its work under such circumstances. So the work of the special committee will be interfered with, and we who serve on the special committee will not be able to do the job we would like to do for the Senate.

I am very hopeful that the Senate will not agree to the motion of the Senator from Nevada. Believe me, Mr. President, I feel that if the motion is agreed to, such action will give the green light to every crook who is yet to appear before the special committee; it will encourage each one of them to say to the committee, "I refuse to answer any questions." Then the work of the special committee will be nullified; and it will be unable to accomplish, in connection with the matters remaining to be acted upon by it, what it has been able to accomplish thus far in the cases on which it has acted.

I cannot see the need or the justice or the right of one committee of the Senate to passing on the work of another duly appointed committee of the Senate. Permit me to say, if I may, that the Senate's Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce is a very fine committee.

Therefore, Mr. President, in order that the Senate may permit the special committee to present to the Senate a report which will be of great use and benefit in connection with the administration of justice in the United States, and, furthermore, in order to make it possible to put behind the bars many crooks who belong there, I sincerely hope that the Senate will not agree to the motion of the distinguished Senator from Nevada.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I should like to say just a word. The question now before the Senate is not one of approval or disapproval of any person. After all, the law applies to everyone; it applies to any person, regardless of who he may be and regardless of the law which he is charged with violating. The protection of the law is afforded to both the high and the low. The law has been written by the Court of last resort. It has been written emphatically. Here is an individual who has been charged with a crime, and who says that he refuses to answer questions because to do so may tend to incriminate him. This individual is charged with a crime, now, in two States of the Union. Is there any doubt that he has a right under the Constitution to protect himself?

That, however, is not the question before the Senate. The question is: Will we sustain the law? Do we believe in the law? Do we believe in following the law as it has been laid down by the Court of last resort? That is the entire question. No delay is involved in the motion. The special committee can make its report at any time it sees fit, and we shall be glad to have it. It should make a report. But the question of whether somebody has violated the law is not involved in the question now before the Senate. It is a question of whether the law, determining what is contumacious and what is not, as it has been written by the Court of last resort, shall be followed. If the Senate wants to vote down the motion, let Senators do so; if the Senate wants to follow the law, as I see it, then Senators will vote to refer this matter to the Judiciary Committee, where a study may be made of the entire question, and a report submitted to the Senate.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, the Senate is a body largely governed by precedents. The Senate, itself, has created a precedent by which this motion should be voted down, for in last November, another noted criminal, yet not as conspicuous as Joe Adonis, or Joe Doto, or whatever other name he goes by, a man from Florida, named Harry Russell, was charged by the Crime Committee with contempt, and we voted a contempt proceeding in his case, willy-nilly pronto, with no reference to the Judiciary Committee. There is a precedent set by the Senate of the United States, itself, in a similar case. Let us respect it and stand by the Senate Committee on Crime.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] to refer the resolution (S. Res. 43) to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report the same back to the Senate within 1 week. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. McFARLAND. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] is absent by leave of the Senate.

The Senators from Virginia [Mr. BYRD and Mr. ROBERTSON], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McMAHON], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] are absent on official business.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK] is absent because of illness.

I announce further that if present and voting, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] would vote "nay."

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] are absent by leave of the Senate.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUFF], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. WELKER] are detained on official business. If present and voting, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUFF] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS] would each vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 59, as follows:

So Mr. McCARRAN'S motion was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to Senate Resolution 43.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I call up Senate Resolution 44 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to considering the remaining resolutions en bloc?

There being no objection, Senate Resolutions 44 to 50, inclusive, were considered and agreed to en bloc, as follows:

Senate Resolution 44

Resolved, That the President of the Senate certify the report of the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate as to the refusal of Anthony J. Accardo to answer a series of questions before the said special committee, together with all facts in connection therewith, under the seal of the United States Senate, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said Anthony J. Accardo may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

Senate Resolution 45

Resolved, That the President of the Senate certify the report of the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate as to the refusal of James Lynch to answer a series of questions before the said special committee, together with all facts in connection therewith, under the seal of the United States Senate, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said James Lynch may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

Senate Resolution 46

Resolved, That the President of the Senate certify the report of the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate as to the refusal of Arthur Longano to answer a series of questions before the said special committee, together with all facts in connection therewith, under the seal of the United States Senate, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said Arthur Longano may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

Senate Resolution 47

Resolved, That the President of the Senate certify the report of the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate as to the refusal of Salvatore Moretti to answer a series of questions before the said special committee, together with all facts in connection therewith, under the seal of the United States Senate, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said Salvatore Moretti may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

Senate Resolution 48

Resolved, That the President of the Senate certify the report of the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate as to the refusal of Walter M. Pechart to answer a series of questions before the said special committee, together with all facts in connection therewith, under the seal of the United States Senate, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said Walter M. Pechart may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

Senate Resolution 49

Resolved, That the President of the Senate certify the report of the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate as to the refusal of Pat Manno, alias Patrick J. Manning, to answer a series of questions before the said special committee, together with all facts in connection therewith, under the seal of the United States Senate, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said Pat Manno, alias Patrick J. Manning, may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

Senate Resolution 50

Resolved, That the President of the Senate certify the report of the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate as to the refusal of Jack Dragna to answer a series of questions before the said special committee, together with all facts in connection therewith, under the seal of the United States Senate, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said Jack Dragna may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I have written opinions as to each one of the other cases, and I ask unanimous consent that the opinions be inserted in the RECORD following the action upon these resolutions.

There being no objection, the opinions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 22, 1951.

MEMORANDUM TO SENATOR ESTES KEFAUVER, CHAIRMAN, RE CONTEMPT OF ANTHONY J. ACCARDO (S. RES. 44)

I have examined the record of the testimony of Anthony J. Accardo in addition to hearing it at the time it was given and it is my opinion, which has previously been conveyed to the committee, that the refusal to answer questions by Attorney J. Accardo was contemptuous of the United States Senate and its Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce.

As chief counsel of the committee, with the advice and concurrence of the committee's legal staff, I have advised the committee and now certify that the contempts complained of are in my opinion punishable as a matter of law. In those instances where the witness asserted a claim of privilege, it is my opinion that the claim was not made in good faith inasmuch as there was no reasonable relationship between the question asked and in line of proof which might incriminate the witness under any Federal statute.

In certifying contempt proceedings, this committee and its counsel have carefully distinguished between refusals to answer based on an arbitrary or fanciful claim of privilege from refusals to answer questions where a claim of privilege might be raised with even a minimum possibility that the witness might be incriminated under any of the laws of the United States.

RUDOLPH HALLEY,
Chief Counsel.

I have examined the record of the testimony of Arthur Longano in addition to hearing it at the time it was given, and it is my opinion, which has previously been conveyed to the committee, that the refusal by Arthur Longano to answer questions was contemptuous of the United States Senate and its Special Committee to Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce.

MEMORANDUM TO SENATOR ESTES KEFAUVER, CHAIRMAN, RE CONTEMPT OF SALVATORE MORETTI (S. RES. 47)

I have examined the record of the testimony of Salvatore Moretti in addition to hearing it at the time it was given and it is my opinion, which has previously been conveyed to the committee, that the refusal to answer questions by Salvatore Moretti was contemptuous of the United States Senate and its Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce.

As chief counsel of the committee, with the advice and concurrence of the committee's legal staff, I have advised the committee and now certify that the contempts complained of are in my opinion punishable as a matter of law. In those instances where the witness asserted a claim of privilege, it is my opinion that the claim was not made in good faith inasmuch as there was no reasonable relationship between the question asked and in line of proof which might incriminate the witness under any Federal statute.

In certifying contempt proceedings, this committee and its counsel have carefully distinguished between refusals to answer based on an arbitrary or fanciful claim of privilege from refusals to answer questions where a claim of privilege might be raised with even a minimum possibility that the witness might be incriminated under any of the laws of the United States.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JANUARY 23, 1951

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, grant that daily we may come to the sacrament of public service with clear minds and courageous hearts and with an eager desire to perform all our tasks in ways which are well pleasing unto Thee.

When we are anxious may we find our peace in the thought of Thy love and power; when we are harassed with doubt may our faith be strengthened, and may we heed Thy voice as Thou dost say: "This is the way, walk ye therein."

Imbue us with a willing obedience to Thy laws and a joyous harmony with Thy divine purposes. May we never surrender our hope and trust in Thee.

Inspire us with the glorious faith which sees, even in the confusion of the darkest day, the foregleams of that greater and better time when the kingdoms of this earth shall become the kingdom of our Lord.

In Christ's name we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RENEGOTIATION OF CONTRACTS

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 87 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1724) to provide for the renegotiation of contracts, and for other purposes. That after general debate which shall be confined to the bill and continued not to exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 87 provides for the consideration of H. R. 1724, to provide for the renegotiation of contracts in connection with the national defense program. It is an open rule, providing for 3 hours of general debate equally divided between the eminent chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and the ranking minority member of the committee, after which the bill is open for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

The bill was unanimously reported by the Committee on Ways and Means, and while I personally feel certain amendments should be discussed and considered on this floor, I know full well the measure is the result of the usual careful and thorough deliberations always given such major legislation by this important committee and is in the best interests of the Nation.

Under the vastly expanded defense budget the President has asked for, involving for defense alone the sum of approximately $40,000,000,000, contractors are being asked to produce many new types of equipment, armament, shells, and so forth, just as they were during the last war, when contracts were let to many manufacturers with no previous experience on such material desperately needed for the war effort. Consequently prices were extremely high initially, but as the work progressed, methods and means were found to substantially reduce these costs of production. To safeguard the interests of the taxpayers and the Government we enacted the Renegotiation Act of 1942 which became law on April 28, 1942. That act was made inapplicable to performance after December 31, 1945. Under it we were able to recover some $11,000,000,000 for the taxpayers in excess costs and there is still pending cases involving some $5,000,000,000.

In 1948 we passed another renegotiation act to cover the expanding aircraft procurement program, which became effective May 21, 1948. This act has since been extended and broadened and is still being administered. However, its provisions are wholly inadequate to meet the present situation.

After exhaustive study and careful preparation the Committee on Ways and Means has reported this bill, designed to supplement existing law as well as to cover the vast development of our procurement program now under way.

Under this bill all responsibility for renegotiation of contracts is placed in an independent agency in the executive branch, known as the Renegotiation Board. It consists of five members, three of which must be civilians, the other two being members of the procurement organization of the Defense Department familiar with its operation. The civilian members are to draw compensation of $12,500 per annum, the Chairman to be designated by the President. All appointments to the Board require the confirmation of the Senate.

The bill makes subject to renegotiation all moneys received or accrued by a contractor or subcontractor on or after January 1, 1951. Renegotiation is limited to contracts over $100,000. Subcontractors—the agents and lobbyists, the so-called 5 percenters—who derive their income from fees or commissions due to their supposed influence in securing these contracts, would be renegotiated when receiving $25,000 or more in any one year. Personally I feel that the basic limit on contractors should be reduced to $25,000 and the limit placed on the lobbyists and 5 percenters for renegotiation should be reduced to $10,000 in any one year.

The bill excludes contractors or subcontractors who are producers of agricultural products. I wonder whether, in this connection, the committee has given full consideration to the excessive profits garnered by the giant outfits producing potatoes in Maine, the organizations, corporations, and individuals operating the vast-acreage wheat and corn fields of the Middle West and the West, and the large plantation owners in the South? I certainly favor excluding the average farmer from the provisions of this bill, but I do not favor exempting the giants in the agricultural field who so frequently take advantage of conditions to extort unconscionable profits because of their power.

Next, it excludes contractors or subcontractors engaged in the primary production of minerals, oil or natural gas, or natural deposits where the product has not been refined, processed, or treated beyond ordinary processes. From accounts continually appearing in the financial pages of our newspapers, these companies are not going bankrupt; in fact, they are making millions upon millions. I wonder why they should be exempt? It is my belief they should be included the same as other contractors in the war effort. I am not opposed to their making reasonable and fair profits, but if their returns are excessive and they are found holding up the Government during these critical times, they, too, should be required to renegotiate their contracts and return to the Government the enormous excess profits that have been found to exist from time to time.

The same applies to the large timber producers who are exempted under this bill. I do not know for certain whether they are responsible for the greatly increased price of lumber today but if they are, they should come under this bill. In addition, we have the farm implement manufacturers, whom I do not see mentioned in this measure. I have perhaps the largest implement manufacturing plant in the United States in my district. Should they be exempted from renegotiation in these times? I never heard any farmer complaining that the price he pays for his machinery is too low; in fact, I have heard universal complaint that the prices are far too high. Should they be exempted from the provisions of this bill? I have no intention of setting myself above the committee. They have held extensive hearings and I feel certain the members have exerted every effort to bring out a fair compromise which resulted in the unanimous reporting of the measure. However, I wonder whether perhaps we could prevail upon the committee to accept some changes during its forthcoming consideration which might bring in some of the elements in our productive economy to which I have referred and which I feel should be included under the provisions of this renegotiation act.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. In a minute if the gentleman will pardon me. The bill also excludes contracts with the several States, our Territories and possessions, and with foreign governments. Let us look into this a moment. It is all right, as I see it, to exempt the States and our Territories and possessions, but as to foreign governments, I question the wisdom of exempting them entirely. We all know how Great Britain controls the wool and tin markets of the world. Should they be permitted to overcharge us in this great emergency and make huge profits on these products so vital to our and their defense as they have done heretofore and are doing now? We are all familiar with the control over natural rubber production held by the Dutch and the French in Indochina and Malaya. Should these countries be excluded and permitted to reap the fantastic profits that now prevail on this critical material in this emergency?

Mr. Speaker, I earnestly believe some of our contracts with foreign firms controlled by foreign governments should not be excluded. With the staggering burden ahead of us, every dollar of unnecessary and unwarranted cost must be saved for our taxpayers who must bear this burden. I hope that at the conclusion of debate on this bill, when it is read under the 5-minute rule, we may inquire of the splendid chairman and gentlemen of the Committee on Ways and Means whether it is feasible and to include some or all of the industries and foreign governments to which I have alluded above under the provisions of this legislation, thus safeguarding and protecting our Government and its taxpayers.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. In other words, what the gentleman is saying is that it is a snare and delusion to think this bill is going to take the profits out of war. I want to commend the gentleman for his statement and I hope he will offer amendments that will plug up the loopholes in the bill.

Mr. SABATH. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. Yes, I wish this bill would take the profit out of war, for if we can bring about such an accomplishment I am inclined to believe the danger of wars would be greatly minimized.

Personally, I am not possessed of the vast store of information this great committee has accumulated on this proposed legislation. The members may have had definite reasons for including these exemptions, by yielding here and there in order to obtain a unanimous report, to satisfy the minority members of the committee who invariably talk economy but when it comes to practicing what they preach they fail to carry out their laudable intentions. We understand how things are done in committees. Consequently, I do not blame the committee, but I do believe some of these exemptions and exceptions are not justifiable or warranted. Would it not be in the interest of economy if we recouped all unjustifiable profits—if we provided for the refunding of excess profits from all, making no exemptions nor creating any favorites?

It may be fitting for me at this time, in mentioning the work of your committee, to call attention to the oft-repeated remarks of that great legislator and statesman, the Honorable James R. Mann, who usually would say "Hindoo do the best that he can do." I hope, as I stated before, that when the bill is read under the 5-minute rule we may arrive at some amendments which will increase the amounts refunded out of the billions we are going to expend and are obliged to expend for the defense of our country.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the bill provides for the renegotiation of defense contracts for the elimination of excessive profits. Its principal provisions, modeled generally after the World War II Renegotiation Act (U. S. C. 50 App. 1191), are summarized as follows:

GENERAL APPLICATION

The act shall apply, first, to receipts and accruals on or after January 1, 1951, from contracts and related subcontracts with the military departments, the Department of Commerce, the General Services Administration, and the Atomic Energy Commission; and, second, to receipts and accruals from contracts and related subcontracts with such other agencies performing defense functions as the President may designate, after such designation. But it shall not apply to receipts and accruals attributable to performance after December 31, 1953. The act shall apply to all contracts falling within its terms, but such contracts shall, nevertheless, contain stipulations consenting to renegotiation.

EXEMPTIONS

The following contracts and subcontracts thereunder are exempt from the act: First, contracts with other governmental agencies, domestic or foreign; second, contracts with agricultural producers for commodities in their raw or natural state, or in the subsequent state in which they are usually first sold or have a market; third, contracts with the owners or operators of mines and wells for the product thereof before it is processed to its first usual marketable form; fourth, contracts with timber owners or log producers for timber which has not been processed beyond the form of logs; and, fifth, contracts which the Renegotiation Board has discretion to, and does, exempt, these being (a) contracts to be performed abroad; (b) contracts wherein the profits can be determined with reasonable certainty when the contract price is established; (c) contracts for a definite period if their provisions are adequate to prevent excessive profits; (d) contracts whose renegotiation would jeopardize secrecy required in the public interest; and (e) contracts as to which it is not administratively feasible to segregate profits attributable to activities not subject to renegotiation.

MINIMUM AMOUNTS SUBJECT TO RENEGOTIATION

A specific yearly exemption is provided each contractor or subcontractor for receipts and accruals under contracts and subcontracts, first, in the nature of purchase orders, agreements to furnish materials or perform work, or patent licenses—in the aggregate amount of $100,000; and, second, in the nature of brokerage agreements—in the aggregate amount of $25,000. If the aggregate receipts and accruals are less than the amounts indicated, there is no renegotiation; and the excessive profits eliminated upon renegotiation shall in no case exceed the difference between aggregate receipts and accruals and such figures.

THE RENEGOTIATION BOARD

The Renegotiation Board is established as an independent executive agency to consist of five members appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, at least three of whom shall be from civilian life. Salaries of $12,500 per annum are provided. The President shall designate a chairman, and the Board shall act by majority vote of a quorum, which shall be three members. The Board is authorized to establish necessary offices, to employ necessary personnel, to establish subordinate divisions of its members for the consideration or review of different types of cases, and to delegate any function or power—except the power to make rules and regulations—to any Government agency and to authorize its redelegation.

REPORTS AND AUDITS OF CONTRACTORS

Every holder of a contract or subcontract subject to the act shall file with the Board a financial statement in such form as the Board shall by regulation determine, on or before the beginning of the fourth calendar month following the end of the contractor's fiscal year. A penalty—$10,000 fine and/or 1-year imprisonment—is provided for willful misrepresentation or failure to comply. The Board shall have the power to audit the books and records of such contractors and subcontractors.

STANDARDS FOR DETERMINATION OF EXCESSIVE PROFITS

In determining excessive profits, the Board shall give consideration to the efficiency of the contractor, reasonableness of costs and profits—with particular regard to volume of production, comparison of war and peacetime products, and so forth—reasonableness of return on net worth—with particular regard to the amount and source of public and private capital—contribution to the defense effort, the extent of risk, the character of the business, and other factors required by the public interest and fair dealing—the latter to be published by the Board. All allowable income-tax deductions and exclusions may be allocated by the contractor as part of his costs, except through carry-back and carry-over operations.

RENEGOTIATION PROCEDURE

Whenever the Board is of the opinion that receipts and accruals under contracts, and so forth, may reflect excessive profits, it shall commence a renegotiation proceeding by notifying the contractor, and so forth, of a conference to be held for the purpose of reaching an agreement as to the elimination of excessive profits. Such agreement shall be conclusive, in the absence of fraud. If no such agreement is reached, the Board shall issue an order determining the amount, if any, of excessive profits, notify the contractor, and so forth, thereof, and furnish a statement of facts used as a basis therefor and its reasons for such determination. Determinations shall be based on the aggregate of receipts and accruals during the fiscal year or other agreed period under contracts held by the contractor, and so forth, except that contracts may be treated separately on request of the contractor. By agreement, renegotiation of the contracts of more than one contractor may be conducted on a consolidated basis. Unless an extension of time for payment of sums due under agreements or orders is granted by the Board, the Board, after the agreement or order is reached, shall direct the appropriate agency heads to eliminate the excessive profits by reductions in amounts payable under contracts or otherwise due the contractor, by directing Government contractors, and so forth, to withhold amounts due subcontractors, by a combination of such methods, or by suit. The contractor shall not be liable for the payment of excessive profits unless proceedings are commenced within 1 year after the filing of the contractor's financial statement, and an agreement or order is reached within 2 years after such commencement. Within 90 days appeals may be taken to the Tax Court from orders of the Board, for a proceeding de novo to determine excessive profits, if any. The filing of such a petition shall not stay the execution of the order. Interest on excessive profits shall accrue at the rate of 6 percent from the date of the Board's order to the date of repayment. Interest at the same rate shall accrue in favor of the contractor on any amounts refunded by the Tax Court. The decision of the Tax Court shall be final.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this rule should be adopted.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1724) to provide for the renegotiation of contracts, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 1724, with Mr. THOMAS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, H. R. 1724, the bill to provide for the renegotiation of contracts, and for other purposes, would make possible the recapture of excessive profits directly attributable to business with agencies engaged in the defense program. Renegotiation, unlike excess-profits taxation, is limited to contracts with the Government, or related subcontracts. The excess-profits tax, however, is confined to corporations, while renegotiation applies to all forms of business enterprise.

A. HEARINGS

Extensive hearings were held by the Committee on Ways and Means in August of last year on the operation of prior renegotiation laws and the renegotiation statute now in effect. Contracts subject to renegotiation under the World War II statute aggregated in excess of $200,000,000,000, from which gross amounts of more than $11,000,000,000 were recaptured through renegotiation. These figures indicate the tremendous task of statutory renegotiation, and the importance of the comprehensive review of renegotiation experience which has been given by the Committee on Ways and Means. The committee carefully considered the testimony of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], who introduced in the last Congress a bill very similar to the pending bill, as well as the testimony of representatives of the executive departments, and witnesses from industry, agriculture, and mining.

The Committee on Ways and Means concluded that present procurement problems are substantially as great as those which brought about the enactment of similar legislation in World War II, and that the scope of the existing renegotiation law is not broad enough to insure the uniform and effective recapture on a fair and equitable basis of excessive profits which may be derived from the expanded defense effort.

B. SUMMARY OF THE BILL

The bill covers contracts, and related subcontracts, with the Departments of Defense, Army, Navy, Air Force, Commerce, General Services Administration, the Atomic Energy Commission, and such other agencies exercising functions in connection with the national defense which the President may designate. It provides that if a contractor or subcontractor receives or accrues more than $100,000 in his fiscal year he may be renegotiated for the year, and that a subcontractor whose income is derived from certain fees or commissions may be renegotiated if he has received or accrued more than $25,000 in his fiscal year. This latter provision applies to the so-called 5 percenters as well as to others. The bill contains a termination date of December 31, 1953.

The bill follows the basic outline of the World War II renegotiation law in providing for mandatory exemption for agricultural commodities and the products of mines, oil or gas wells, and timber, except that the exemptions for such products in general are limited to the producers of the raw commodity and do not generally apply beyond the first commercially marketable state. In addition to the mandatory exemptions, certain other exemptions could be provided in the discretion of the Renegotiation Board.

This bill, unlike prior renegotiation laws, would establish a five-man renegotiation board, independent of the procurement agencies, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Members would receive compensation of $12,500 per annum. At least three of the members would have to be from civilian life. The Board, of course, could delegate to the various procurement agencies the responsibility for initiating renegotiation of a contractor, but the decisions of the agency would be subject to review by the Board. In authorizing the Renegotiation Board to delegate some of its authority to conduct renegotiation proceedings it is intended that there should be no unnecessary duplication of renegotiation offices and personnel in the same area. Moreover, as stressed in the committee report, it is contemplated, in order to maintain the separation of the renegotiation and procurement functions, that renegotiation duties should not be delegated to agency personnel who are directly responsible for procurement. The determinations of the Renegotiation Board would be subject to an entirely new review by the Tax Court of the United States, the redetermination of which would be final.

Under the bill contractors and subcontractors would file a financial statement with the Renegotiation Board within 3 months after the close of their fiscal year. The Board would have 1 year thereafter in which to initiate renegotiation proceedings, which would be commenced by formal notice to the contractor or subcontractor by registered mail.

An effort would first be made to obtain the agreement of the contractor or subcontractor to the elimination of excessive profits. If this is not found possible, a determination is made unilaterally, from which the contractor or subcontractor may take an appeal to the Tax Court.

CONCLUSION

Mr. Chairman, the President has submitted a budget message calling for military expenditures at the rate of $41,500,000,000 a year. This rate of expenditure for military purposes is higher than that for any year of World War II prior to 1943. The acceleration of the defense program has resulted in procurement pricing problems quite similar to those which brought about the enactment of a renegotiation law during World War II. That renegotiation statute, broadly conceived and administered with care, was found to be a desirable supplement to other methods of avoiding excessive war profits. As President Roosevelt stated in his budget message of January 10, 1944:

> The American people are united in their resolution to prevent war profiteering. Taxation alone is not enough. One of the most constructive attempts ever made to reduce profiteering at the expense of the Government in wartime was the renegotiation law enacted by the Congress in April 1942. That statute gives to the major procurement agencies the right and charges them with the duty to reexamine their war contracts and subcontracts and to recover excessive amounts paid under them, as well as to reduce inordinately high prices being charged for goods still to be delivered.
> The record of performance under that statute has been good. The cost of our procurement program has already been reduced by over $5,000,000,000 by contractors' agreements to refund money already paid them by the Government for war matériel and by price reductions granted the Government on goods still to be delivered. A considerable part of this amount would have escaped even wartime taxes. Many wartime profits are not subject to excess-profits taxation; moreover, even taxes paid may be refunded under various provisions of the present excess-profits-tax law. The recapture of exorbitant war profits, in my judgment, should be definitely assured by renegotiation. To measure the benefits of the renegotiation statute in terms of dollars recovered from war contractors is to understate its beneficial effect. The statute is enabling us to combine speed of procurement with fair prices for the goods the Government must buy. Without it the war procurement program would be handicapped.

Mr. Chairman, the enactment of this bill, based upon the foundation of our World War II experience in renegotiation and strengthened in the light of that experience, will likewise further the best interests of the Government and of all the people in the greatly expanded defense program upon which we are now engaged. I trust that the bill will be speedily enacted.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 25 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, briefly stated the bill H. R. 1724 delegates to a 5-member administrative board the power to tax 100 percent of excessive profits derived by contractors and subcontractors from contracts with the executive departments. The bill contains no definition of the term "excessive profits" other than to say that it means that portion of profits derived from contracts with the departments and subcontracts which is determined to be excessive and the bill provides only that in making the determination of excessive consideration shall be given to six general factors and to such other factors the consideration of which the public interest and fair and equitable dealing may require.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. REED of New York. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DONDERO. I hope the gentleman will discuss this point during his remarks. I listened with great interest to what the chairman of the committee had to say about the board of five to be set up by the President. We have more than 2,000,000 Government employees now. Did the committee not think that out of that two million the President could find five people who would be competent to make up this Board of Renegotiation without setting up a new board and going outside to appoint five more men?

Mr. REED of New York. Let me answer the question this way. There was some difference of opinion about the matter. The first bill provided for seven members to be taken practically from the defense departments. A motion was made and carried to reduce it to a board of five, three of whom should be civilians. There were some who thought that the procurement agencies of the Government, who went out and procured the contract for the things that they needed and needed quickly, and in which there had been no experience heretofore in the manufacture, therefore could not determine the costs. Some members of the committee felt that perhaps the procurement people were better prepared, having made the contracts and studied all phases of them, than perhaps a new board of civilians who had had no connection with it. However, after very careful consideration, it was determined that there should be an independent board, with three civilians.

Mr. DONDERO. That is not exactly my point. My point was, Could they not have found five people within the Government now, without setting up a new board and going outside of the Government and obtaining five members?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield——

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. That is exactly what I wanted to discuss with the gentleman.

We considered the fact that, as the gentleman from New York states, the original bill provided for a board of seven to be taken from the departments of the Government. The committee, after thorough consideration and extensive hearings and consultation with people who had been administering the law, reached the conclusion that whereas to have one agency of the Government, or employees of the Government, making the contract, it might be fairer not to have other agencies of the Government renegotiating contracts made by Government agencies, and that in the interest of fairness to the contractors of the country it would probably be better to draw these five or part of these five Board members from the businessmen of the country who have had experience in business and whose experience is not limited to governmental activities.

Mr. REED of New York. One other point that I wish to make is that there is involved, of course, the principle of being judge and jury. Some felt that those who made the first determination would stand adamant against a finding that the determination was not correct.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I am sure my distinguished friend will recall that Hon. Robert Patterson, Secretary of War, whom we all know well and favorably, and who has had much experience in renegotiation of war contracts as a result of World War II, strongly recommended this being made an independent board.

Mr. REED of New York. That is true and perhaps it had a good deal to do with changing the opinion of the committee.

My purpose, Mr. Chairman, in calling the attention of the House at the very onset to the broad, unrestricted language and the sweeping delegation of power which this legislation provides is to make it perfectly clear to the House that this legislation can and should be justified and supported only because of the present accelerated emergency defense program. Renegotiation, like its twin brother, the excess-profits tax, has absolutely no place in a free economy under normal conditions. Unfortunately, of course, there are some who seek to use the present emergency period as a means for permanently fastening Socialist policies on our economic system, and it is of the utmost importance that the Congress be alert in preventing this insidious attack from within. I am glad to be able to say, however, that the Ways and Means Committee has been alert in this instance and that this legislation carries a termination date of December 31, 1953. This will insure that an accounting to the Congress will have to be made by those entrusted with the heavy responsibility for administering this remarkable delegation of power.

HISTORY OF RENEGOTIATION

The first Renegotiation Act was a part of the Sixth Supplemental National Defense Appropriation Act of 1942. That act was applicable to profits made in fiscal years ending prior to June 30, 1943, and contracts awarded by the War, Navy, and Treasury Departments, the Maritime Commission, the War Shipping Administration, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and its subsidiaries. In view, however, of the considerable lack of uniformity in the administration of the 1942 act as well as a lack of any specific standards to be used as the measuring rod to determine excessive profits, the Congress enacted the Renegotiation Act of 1943 on which the bill before us is patterned.

The 1943 law differed from the 1942 Renegotiation Act in four principal ways:

First. The 1943 act created a War Contracts Price Adjustment Board which included a representative from each of the named governmental agencies. This Board was to formulate renegotiation policies and to be responsible for the administration of the act.

Second. The 1943 act provided that contested renegotiation determinations could be appealed to the tax court.

Third. The 1943 act eliminated from renegotiation all contractors whose gross annual wartime business was less than $500,000.

Fourth. The 1943 act set forth seven factors which the price adjustment boards were to consider in determining whether a contractor had realized excessive profits.

In addition, the 1943 act made it mandatory for a contractor subject to the terms of the act to file a report on his wartime business rather than leaving it to the boards to locate contractors subject to renegotiation. It also exempted from renegotiation contracts for certain types of articles and permitted the exemption of certain other contracts. By subsequent amendments the 1943 act was extended until December 31, 1945.

The 1943 act expired at the end of 1945 and at the present time renegotiation authority is contained in the Renegotiation Act of 1948 which was a part of an appropriation bill for the contracts of military and naval aircraft. Although the provisions of the 1948 law have been extended to other military appropriations there is no authority at the present time to renegotiate contracts of any Government agencies other than the Department of Defense, and this limitation is one of the principal reasons for the enactment of H. R. 1724.

RENEGOTIATION PROCEEDINGS

H. R. 1724 is in general divided into two parts. The first part under title I is the substance of the bill and deals with the coverage of the new renegotiation provisions, creates a Renegotiation Board, and establishes the procedure's limitations and exemptions from coverage. The second part which is title II abolishes the War Contracts Price Adjustment Board which was created under the World War II act and provides for the transfer of certain residual functions and powers of that Board to the Administrator of General Services and to the new independent Renegotiation Board established under the bill.

I think, Mr. Chairman, it would be of interest to the Members of the House if I outlined briefly at this point the renegotiation proceedings and process provided for in the bill.

The renegotiation process is set in motion by the mailing of a notice, by registered mail, to the contractor or subcontractor. An effort is then made by the Board to reach an agreement with the contractor or subcontractor as to the amount of excessive profits, if any. If no agreement is reached, the Renegotiation Board issues an order determining the amount of excessive profits and so advises the contractor or subcontractor by registered mail. Unless a petition is filed by the contractor or subcontractor within the prescribed time to the Tax Court the order of the Renegotiation Board is final and is not subject to any review or redetermination by any court or other agency. If, however, a petition is filed with the Tax Court, the proceeding before the Tax Court is a proceeding de novo and the Tax Court has the exclusive jurisdiction to make a final determination of the amount, if any, of the excess profits received or accrued by the contractor or subcontractor. No further appeal is provided for in the bill.

I might say there was some sentiment on the part of certain members of the committee to provide for an appeal to the district courts, but after very full consideration it was thought that perhaps the present method is the fairer way to handle it effectively because the Tax Court has had considerable experience in these matters.

Where no agreement can be reached with the contractor or subcontractor and a determination of excessive profits has been made by the Board, the Board is required, if requested by the contractor or subcontractor, to furnish a statement of the amount of such determination, of the facts used as a basis for that determination, and the reasons for such determination. This statement may not, however, be used in the Tax Court either as proof of the facts or for the conclusions contained in the statement.

The Board is given the right to audit the books or records of any contractor or subcontractor subject to title I, and upon request of the Board and the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury the services of the Bureau of Internal Revenue may be made available to the Board.

A proceeding to determine the amount of excessive profits for any fiscal year may be commenced within 1 year after the financial statement required from the contractor or subcontractor for such year is filed with the Board and the Board has 2 years within which to complete the proceeding either through agreement or by an order. The 2-year period may, however, be extended by mutual agreement and the 2-year limitation does not apply to a review by the Board of an order made within such 2 years pursuant to any delegation of authority from the Board. Every contractor or subcontractor having renegotiable business within the provisions of the bill is required to file with the Board, on or before the first day of the fourth calendar month following the close of his fiscal year, a financial statement setting forth such information, and in such form and detail as the Board may by its regulations prescribe.

THE RENEGOTIATION BOARD

The success of the administration of this Renegotiation process will depend primarily on the caliber of personnel appointed to the Board. This is so because in reality there are specific standards provided in the bill and the determination of what are excessive profits is in the final analysis a matter of judgment by the Board and by the Tax Court. The bill provides that the Board shall be composed of only five members appointed by the President with the consent of the Senate and at least three of these members must be from civilian life. The salary provided for in the bill is $12,500, but I understand that there will be a committee amendment to increase this amount. This should be done, because it is clear that the duties of the members of this Board will be among the most important duties of any emergency defense agency.

I personally feel that the tremendous responsibility of the Board could better be executed if there were a seven-man Board instead of a five-man Board, and I feel also that all three of the military services should have a representative on the Board. As I see it, renegotiation is basically an integral part of the procurement process and it seems to me that the three services which are charged with the responsibility of spending the huge sums appropriated by the Congress should have the major responsibility to the people of seeing that the money they spend is spent prudently. To the best of my knowledge the criticism of the operation of the 1943 act did not arise because of the major role played by the services, and, on the contrary, the success of the 1943 act is attributable primarily to the high caliber of the personnel on the Board. In the executive session of the Ways and Means Committee, I argued in favor of a Board of seven, at least three of whom to be appointed from the services, and a seven-man

Board was recommended by all the interested executive departments and was approved by the Bureau of the Budget. Despite this, the sentiment of the committee was for a five-man Board, and recognizing that this is a question of judgment and that progress is the result of compromise, I accept the majority decision.

COVERAGE AND EXEMPTIONS

H. R. 1724 provides that a contractor or subcontractor is not subject to renegotiation unless he has received or accrued more than $100,000 in the year, but subcontractors whose income is derived from certain fees or commissions will be subject to renegotiation for any year in which they have receipts or accruals of $25,000 or more. January 1, 1951, is the starting point and the provisions of title I are made applicable to all contracts with the departments which are specifically named in the bill and related subcontracts to the extent of the amounts received or accrued by a contractor or subcontractor on or after this date. The provisions apply to such contracts and subcontracts whether they were made before January 1, 1951. In the case of contracts with departments designated by the President pursuant to section 103 (a) of the bill, the provisions of the bill apply to the extent of the amounts received or accrued by a contractor or subcontractor on or after the first day of the first month beginning after the date of such designation. In this case, also, it is immaterial whether the contracts or subcontracts were made on, before, or after the date of designation.

Certain contracts and subcontracts are exempted entirely. These are set forth in section 106 and are as follows:

First. Contracts with States, possessions, Territories, or foreign governments.

Second. Contracts or subcontracts with producers of agricultural commodities for the agricultural commodity in its raw or natural state or, if the commodity is not customarily sold or does not have an established market in its raw or natural state, in the first form or state beyond the raw or natural state in which it is customarily sold or has an established market.

Third. Contracts or subcontracts for the product of mines, oil or gas wells, mineral or natural deposits where a product has not been processed, refined, or treated beyond the ordinary treatment processes, normally applied in order to obtain the first commercially marketable product, but only if such contract or subcontract is with the owner or operator of the producing property. Ordinary treatment processes in the case of mines, wells, and deposits are defined as being those used in determining gross income from property for which a percentage depletion allowance is provided in section 114 (b) (3) or (4) of the Internal Revenue Code. In the case of other products, the Board will prescribe regulations defining ordinary treatment processes.

Fourth. Contracts or subcontracts for timber which has not been processed beyond the form of logs where the contract or subcontract is with the owner of the timber property or the producer of the logs.

Fifth. Subcontracts directly or indirectly under a contract or subcontract to which the Renegotiation Act does not apply by reason of any of the above exemptions.

In the case of integrated producers of exempted products, the Renegotiation Board by regulation will prescribe a cost allowance substantially equivalent to the amount at which the product could be sold in the exempted state or form.

In general these mandatory exemptions are similar to the exemptions contained in the 1943 act. Certain limitations on the exemptions have been imposed by this bill but it is my understanding that these restrictions will not prevent the application of the exemption in accordance with the policy determined by the committee.

SUGGESTED IMPROVEMENTS

For the most part, Mr. Chairman, the Republican minority of the committee was in accord with the major provisions of the bill. There were, however, certain features of the bill which we opposed unanimously and certain other features which I, together with some members of the minority, disapproved.

For example, the Republican minority of the committee felt strongly that the provisions of the bill should be limited to contracts connected with the national defense in keeping with the general declaration of policy set forth at the beginning of the bill. Under the bill, however, any contract within the prescribed amount with any Government agency will come within the provisions of title II whether or not the contract is related to the defense program. This will not only impose an additional duty on the Board but is entirely unnecessary and ill-advised. I trust that when this legislation reaches the other body this point will be corrected both in the interest of lightening the burden on the Board as well as in the interest of restricting this law to its proper place.

In addition to my feeling that there should be a seven-member Board with increased salaries, I believe the bill should provide for an appeal from the Tax Court. In this connection it should be remembered that this legislation may have to remain in effect for a considerable time and that by reducing the amount of negotiable business from $500,000, as provided for in the 1943 act, to $100,000, the number of persons who feel aggrieved is bound to increase sharply. It seems to me that considering the broad authority of the Board, the lack of any specific standards in the bill, and the fact that the proceeding in the Tax Court is a proceeding de novo, some form of appeal on the record should be permitted.

Another defect in the bill is that nowhere in the legislation does the Congress express its intent that efficiency should be rewarded. If you will examine the seven factors in section 103 on pages 4 and 5 of the bill under which the determination of excessive profits is to be made by the Board, you will see that the Board does not have to reward efficiency of operation and economy in the use of materials, facilities, and manpower. I think such an expression of congressional intent should be contained in the bill, and that the contractors and subcontractors subject to renegotiation would know that the more efficiently they perform the work the greater would be the amount of profit they would be entitled to retain. I should imagine that this will be the policy of the Board, but there should be no doubt that it is the policy of the Congress.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I shall support this bill because it is made necessary by the emergency defense program. At a time when fair and reasonable prices can be satisfactorily determined in advance and where firm-price buying is possible, this legislation should be repealed.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. During the procurement in the last war I believe it was the Navy Department that established a policy which provided that in the procurement of certain items if efficiency was shown by the manufacturer some proportion of the profits that ensued from the efficiency might be retained by the manufacturer. That proved to be a very profitable thing for the United States. If no incentive to reduce these costs is provided in this bill, then the cost to the Government under the procurement policies is going to be very much higher than it would otherwise be, I am sure. I hope the gentleman can impress that fact on the Senate.

Mr. REED of New York. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JONAS. Does the exemption under the agricultural clause of this bill exempt cotton and tobacco?

Mr. REED of New York. In the raw state; yes.

Mr. JONAS. Does not the gentleman concede that the appeal which is provided to the Tax Court is merely a gesture, it is nugatory, because the bill provides that when you take the appeal to the Tax Court it does not stay the execution of the order entered by the Board; therefore, they could ruin a businessman before he ever got a final adjudication of his case before the Tax Court.

Mr. REED of New York. Of course, he does have the advantage of going to the Tax Court de novo, and nothing that has occurred up to the time he goes there is relevant to the case.

Mr. JONAS. That is right, it is de novo, and that merely gives him the same status as in the lower court, but it does not stay the execution. It does not avail him of anything judicially.

Mr. REED of New York. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. JONAS. After the Board has entered a finding and they enter judgment he can appeal from that. He gets a trial de novo.

Mr. REED of New York. That is right.

Mr. JONAS. It is not a stay of execution. Assuming the judgment is for $500,000 and the Board proceeds to levy judgment and sell the man out, it may take 2 or 3 years to get a review of the case during which time the appeal is pending, and if he recovers he gets his money back plus 6 percent interest. I do not think that is right. That is exactly what the act says.

Mr. KEATING. I would like to ask the gentleman about the provision in which it is sought to do something with these 5-percenters. As I understand it if they have total fees of under $25,000 under this bill they are not subject to renegotiation; is that correct?

Mr. REED of New York. That is correct.

Mr. KEATING. Does that mean the total fees from all sources or from any one contract?

Mr. REED of New York. From all sources.

Mr. KEATING. So that they could be getting $20,000 from a number of different contractors and still not be subject to renegotiation under the provisions of the bill?

Mr. REED of New York. That is correct.

Mr. KEATING. Then in connection with this provision about exempting various contracts or subcontracts from the provisions of the bill as I understand the only ones which the Board has the power to examine are those specifically set up under the law? They cannot reach out and exempt any other kind of contract?

Mr. REED of New York. That is correct; except the Board does have discretion to exempt certain contracts of a secret nature, and others within a limited area.

Mr. KEATING. Are standards set up with reference to that?

Mr. REED of New York. To a certain degree; yes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Would the gentleman explain to the Committee why the date of January 1, 1951, was fixed in view of the very large appropriations and undoubtedly contracts before that date?

Mr. REED of New York. That was a unanimous decision of the full committee. It was the sentiment of the committee that this was an appropriate date, keeping in mind the constitutional problem and the fact that no substantial amount of receipts from defense contractor from nonrenegotiable contracts.

Mr. JAVITS. That is a finding of fact by the committee and not a material question?

Mr. REED of New York. That is right.

Mr. JAVITS. That is except as to contracts after January 1?

Mr. REED of New York. That is right.

Mr. KEATING. With reference to these members from civilian life that means they take them in from the outside and does not mean they could name them from civil servants now working for the Government, or does it include that?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes; I believe it does, although, of course, I hope that the President will appoint experienced businessmen.

Mr. KEATING. The purpose of it is to get the views of outside business?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes. They should be high-standing men familiar with business, and not political appointees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON].

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, this bill, H. R. 1270, provides for the renegotiation of contracts entered into by those departments of the Government exercising functions in connection with the national defense. The purpose of this bill is to prevent the accumulation and retention of unconscionable and clearly excessive profits by contractors and subcontractors furnishing the Government with the materials and services needed for defense, and thereby to bring about on an over-all basis a fair and equitable level of prices for such materials and services. It is not a revenue measure; it is not excess profits tax legislation such as that recently enacted by the Congress, which applies on a fixed and uniform basis to all taxpayers. This legislation stands on its own feet and applies only to specified contracts and subcontracts.

As the House knows, statutory renegotiation of contracts had its origin in World War II. I have always warmly advocated and supported legislation of this type, beginning with the First Renegotiation Act passed in 1942, and I strongly urge the enactment of the present bill.

The wartime renegotiation statute expired by its terms on December 31, 1945. The history of that law is one of accomplishment. Conceived to prevent war profiteering, and notably successful in that aim, it proved of great economic and morale value to the country in time of need. When, therefore, world conditions impelled us less than 2½ years later to initiate a program of expanded aircraft construction, it was deemed essential by the Congress to reinvoke this wholesome and effective safeguard in order to protect the expenditure of some $3,000,000,000 of public funds for that purpose and certain related procurement.

The result was the Renegotiation Act of 1948, which became law on May 21, 1948. That law in its original form applied only to contracts obligating funds appropriated or consolidated by the Appropriation Act of which it was a part. Within a matter of weeks it was extended to cover the procurement of aircraft and aircraft parts when the contracts for those items obligated fiscal year 1949 funds. A year later, our military expenditures having continued to increase, the 1948 act was further broadened to cover all negotiated contracts entered into by the Department of Defense in the fiscal year 1950. Last year, we reenacted this provision to include the current fiscal year 1951.

As a result of these several extensions, the Renegotiation Act of 1948 is still actively on the statute books. It is still very much alive, indeed, and it covers large areas of procurement by the military departments. However, there are several gaps in it—until now not too important, but now very important in view of the billions of dollars which we are about to spend for defense.

What are these gaps? The 1948 act does not apply to any contracts entered into prior to May 21, 1948, although some contracts entered into prior to that date are still in production. It does not cover any contracts obligating fiscal 1949 funds for items other than aircraft or aircraft parts, although here again it is possible that some such contracts are still in production. It does not cover any contracts entered into in the fiscal years 1950 and 1951 as a result of formal advertising and competitive bidding, being limited only to negotiated contracts entered into during those years. It does not attach to any contracts for $1,000 or less, notwithstanding the tremendous dollar aggregate of such contracts. Finally, it does not cover contracts of any Government agencies other than the Department of Defense, which is a serious deficiency in the light of the steadily increasing defense procurement activity of various other Government departments.

It is obvious, then, that the existing renegotiation law is inadequate to protect our vast current and impending expenditures to a sufficient extent. A new renegotiation law, broader in scope and closing the gaps of the present law, is needed. The bill now before the House fills that need.

On the production front, with our huge national industrial plant galvanized again to capacity output, our situation today is similar to that of the early days of World War II. Once again we are faced with the necessity for hasty procurement on an immense scale, which makes close pricing impossible. We cannot delay our procurement of essential military supplies until we can complete all of the cost studies and analyses we might otherwise be inclined to make as an incident to careful purchasing. That would be business as usual, and we are in no position to conduct our business in that idyllic fashion.

Once again, too, we shall call upon industry to produce military supplies which, by reason of their specialized and peculiar nature, are not subject to accurate costing in advance. Indeed, since the close of the last war we have developed many new weapons and items of equipment and many changes and improvements in the manufacturing processes of other items. The manufacturer of jet planes or guided missiles is unable to foretell his costs with the accuracy of an established manufacturer of fountain pens or bicycles.

Once again, too, industry will be asked to deliver supplies in quantities far beyond any normal or customary level. This, of course, will have a direct and considerable effect on production costs, the full extent of which it is not possible to determine in advance with any reasonable degree of accuracy.

These are the three principal uncertainties that made it necessary to have renegotiation in World War II. It is these same factors which make it imperative now.

It is also obvious and inevitable that the enormous Government purchasing now under way will have a sharp impact upon the level of industrial prices paid throughout the country for the innumerable parts and components that go into the production of military end items. The restraints imposed by renegotiation upon prices by preventing the retention of excessive profits will go a long way toward curbing inflationary price tendencies in this large segment of our economy. This, manifestly, is salutary.

Renegotiation is not an exact science. There is no fixed formula or yardstick for the determination of excessive profits, nor is there any fixed maximum to the amount of profits which may be realized or retained by any contractor. The present bill is patterned closely after the wartime renegotiation statute, which also formed the basis for the act of 1948. In it, as in those prior acts, renegotiation remains entirely a judgment operation. It has been successful as such. The bill lays down certain factors, virtually the same as those formerly prescribed, which must be taken into consideration by the renegotiation authorities in determining in every case whether excessive profits exist, and if so, in what amount. Beyond this there are no curbs imposed in the bill upon the officials to whom are granted the authority to make final determinations of excessive profits, subject only to review in the Tax Court of the United States.

This freedom of discretionary action is the outstanding characteristic of the whole technique of renegotiation as it has been developed to this time. It provides at once its greatest virtue and its clearest warning. Its virtue is that it affords all of the flexibility that could possibly be needed to do justice in the unlimited variety of cases that will arise. The warning that it sounds, directed to the Congress, is that only to men of the highest caliber can discretion so gently restricted be safely entrusted. It is for this reason that the bill provides for a Renegotiation Board of five members, all to be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. It is anticipated, of course, that the Board will function at the operating level through regional or departmental or other subboards or divisions, for which appropriate powers of delegation and redelegation are provided, but final authority within the administrative framework of the act is vested in the Board. The administration of renegotiation, both during the last war and currently, is distinguished for the high level of personnel who have been attracted, persuaded, or assigned to it. I am confident that many of these persons, and others of equal talents and attainments, will be found available to carry out the functions and responsibilities created by the enactment of the present bill.

I have found that very little is known about the actual operation of renegotiation except by those who have conducted it for the Government and by those executives of business and industry who have personally participated in its procedures. I do not pretend myself to know the intricacies of this complex and technical process, but I do know, and I think it important to emphasize before this body, that renegotiation is an operation which is broadly conceived and broadly administered. It is not a detailed process of audit and examination, contract by contract and dollar by dollar. And it is by no means a device to remedy or repair errors or inequities in individual procurement transactions. The renegotiation authorities do not reset the price of each contract after completion of performance and payment. This type of individual price adjustment, which was contemplated in the earliest days of renegotiation and from which the process derived its name, gave way almost immediately, out of obvious necessity, to overall review of a contractor's operations for his entire fiscal year.

This basic conception is indispensable to any understanding of what renegotiation is and the way it works. All of a contractor's receipts or accruals during his year from all of his contracts and subcontracts subject to renegotiation, including both his profitable and his nonprofitable ones, and all of his costs and expenses applicable thereto, are considered at a single time in a single proceeding together with all other facts and figures pertinent to the statutory factors, and a single over-all determination is made. If no excessive profits are found to exist, a clearance is granted to the contractor. If it is determined that excessive profits were realized, a determination of the amount thereof is made and this determination is embodied in an agreement or order.

It is evident that in this type of operation the renegotiation authorities must use, not a fine-toothed comb, but a broad brush. And it is for precisely this reason that renegotiation is not designed to be, nor can it be, a substitute for sound procurement pricing. Renegotiation does no more than prevent or eliminate profits that are clearly excessive and unreasonable on an over-all basis—profits that it would be clearly unconscionable for a contractor to retain from his dealings with his Government in circumstances which precluded proper initial pricing. The sole objective as well as the net result of a renegotiation proceeding is to make certain that the Government has paid no more to a contractor, directly or indirectly, than he should in good conscience be entitled to receive in the circumstances—in a word, that from the efforts of the Government to maintain the common defense for the common good, he has not accumulated more than a fair return or over-all price for what he has done. The purpose is not to take money away from the contractor, but rather to see that not too much money has been taken from the Government under unusual conditions lacking the controls normally exerted upon prices by the pressures of competition.

This bill is a major step, and a necessary one, in our drive to achieve impregnable strength without fatally disrupting our economy. I urge its prompt passage by the House.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, the bill, H. R. 1724, now under consideration is here by unanimous report of the Committee on Ways and Means. This bill is patterned very closely after the World War II Renegotiation Act, with certain necessary changes applicable to present conditions. The first section of the pending bill, which is section 101, the declaration of policy, gives a very clear and definite statement as to the purposes of this act. The act is limited in its application to 2 years, or until December 31, 1953. This is a very important defense measure, and it should be considered in connection with the defense program. It will be remembered that we had a renegotiation law during World War II, and, as I recall the figures, some $200,000,000,000 of war contracts were awarded, and under the application of the renegotiation program about $11,000,000,000 was recaptured by the Government from contractors during that period.

Your Committee on Ways and Means has given very careful and thorough consideration to this subject over a considerable period of time. Hearings were held during the latter part of the last session of Congress. Then the committee became busily engaged with the consideration of tax legislation and had to carry this over until this session. Very thorough and careful consideration has been given to the experience had under the renegotiation program of World War II. This pending bill provides for the renegotiation of these war contracts and provides certain standards that are to be considered by the Renegotiation Board. In general, the act of 1948 only applies to contracts for aircraft, aircraft parts, and certain other related provisions, but this bill is more comprehensive in its scope and application and is intended to apply to all contracts entered into by the Government during this defense period.

As has been pointed out before, the bill provides for renegotiation of contracts where the contractor receives in excess of $100,000 during the year. In the case of subcontractors receiving fees and commissions, sometimes referred to as the 5-percenters, if their total aggregate amount reaches the sum of $25,000 during the year, they are subject to renegotiation.

The bill contains certain very definite exemptions which are very important, and in the light of the experience had under the World War II renegotiation program it is thought by your committee that the inclusion of these specific exemptions will greatly improve the administration of this act.

First, contracts or subcontracts are exempted with producers of agricultural products, as has been explained, in the raw or natural state.

Second, contracts or subcontracts for the products of mines, oil or gas wells, mineral or natural deposits, where the product has not been processed, refined, or treated beyond the ordinary treatment for the first marketable process.

Third, contracts or subcontracts for timber which has not been processed beyond the form of logs.

Fourth, subcontractors, directly or indirectly under a contract or subcontract, to which the Renegotiation Act does not apply by reason of these exemptions.

And fifth, contracts with States, possessions, Territories, or foreign governments.

The Board is given certain discretionary power to exempt other contracts as is necessary in the application of an act of this kind.

I would like to invite attention to a provision directly in point with one of the questions asked a few moments ago. That is with respect to the efficiency of the contractor. That is stated as one of the definite standards that must be taken into consideration. By referring to page 4 of the pending bill, it will be noted that in determining excess profits there shall—it is mandatory—there shall be taken into consideration the following factors: The first of these factors is the efficiency of the contractor, with particular regard to attainment of quantity and quality production, reduction of costs, and economy in the use of materials, facilities, and manpower.

Then there follow six other definite standards that are here provided shall be taken into consideration by the Board; and the seventh or last of these provisions is a discretionary authority to the Board to consider such other factors as they deem appropriate to arrive at the proper degree of equity and fairness in dealing with the contractor.

The committee is of the opinion that the enactment of this legislation will result in a considerable saving to the Government in the renegotiation of these contracts during this period of emergency. As I stated a moment ago, our experience under the World War II act resulted in some $11,000,000,000 being saved to the Government. All indications are that we may have contracts during this period of emergency even in excess of the $200,000,000,000 that were in effect during the period of World War II; so we may reasonably expect that even a larger amount will be recovered by the Government under the application of this act than was experienced under the World War II renegotiation program.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. Can the gentleman tell me why this was not made retroactive to the date of President Truman's launching us into war in Korea?

Mr. COOPER. That point, of course, was very carefully considered by the committee, and two considerations were borne in mind. First, we already have a renegotiation act that applies to at least some of these war contracts; and, second, it was thought that in the interest of fairness it should not be made retroactive too far back because the contractors had no notice; the business people of the country had no reason to expect that the contracts they then entered into would be renegotiated.

Mr. GROSS. Of course, I am sure the gentleman from Tennessee will agree that the boys who were drafted and sent over to Korea likewise had no indication prior to that time that they were going to be dumped into a war immediately, yet they are not being given the benefit of any renegotiation procedure.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman from Iowa could not be any more anxious than I to prevent excessive profits being made during a period of war.

Mr. GROSS. One further question, if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. COOPER. With pleasure.

Mr. GROSS. Why are contracts with foreign governments exempted? These are defense contracts, are they not? This applies only to defense contracts, does it not?

Mr. COOPER. Oh, no; this is general; it applies to all contracts with the specified departments of the Government during this period of time.

Mr. GROSS. But why are contracts with foreign governments exempted?

Mr. COOPER. One reason is that under the World War II Renegotiation Act they were exempted; and, further, it was felt that we could not very well renegotiate contracts with foreign governments. How would you enforce it?

Mr. GROSS. By the same machinery you have for enforcement in the matter of any other contract. Why not?

Mr. COOPER. There was a gentleman down in my country who wanted to know why it was that some of the World War I war debts were forgiven to certain countries of the world. He said: "My goodness! Did not this Government take some security on those notes?"

After all, you are dealing with another government in these matters.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. JONAS. If the gentleman will permit, I have just a brief question: First of all, does the gentleman propose in his discourse to touch upon the right of appeal? If so, I can defer it, but that is the question I wish to ask now.

Mr. COOPER. I would be glad to hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. JONAS. I can subscribe to the provisions of this bill in all of its earlier phases and ramifications. If I interpret this right of appeal de novo correctly, and I am following the language of the report which says that the filing of a petition in the Tax Court shall not stay the execution of an order of the Board and that where the United States has collected amounts under the order of the Board greater than the amount determined by the Court the excess shall be refunded and interest at the rate of 6 percent paid thereon.

Mr. COOPER. I believe that provision appears on page 33 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. JONAS. If the bill later on explains this what apparently appears on the face of it to be a very harsh provision, I am satisfied, but if it stays as I am reading it, I am sure the gentleman from Tennessee will concede it is a vicious section of the bill. If a contractor appeared before a board and he is accused of having overreached himself to the extent of $500,000, the board will then enter a judgment against him. He will say, "I am appealing to the Tax Court," under a trial de novo, a trial over, but no bond is given and the board would sell him out. That would do away with his working capital. He would have to wait 2 or 3 years and in that time you would ruin the man industrially and his business. It does not make sense, does it?

Mr. COOPER. There are two points I would mention in reply to the gentleman's question, and it is an appropriate one. The first is, this identical provision was included in the World War II Renegotiation Act. No difficulty was experienced and no trouble arose as is anticipated by the gentleman from Illinois. None of those appearing at the hearing raised any question about that. So the experience was such that we are not apprehensive about that matter. The second point is that the contractor is entitled to receive 6 percent interest from the time the determination is made.

Mr. JONAS. That is true.

Mr. COOPER. Certainly he can provide ample credit to tide him over when he is receiving 6 percent interest from the Government during that time.

Mr. JONAS. I agree with the gentleman, and what has transpired in the past is all very well to be used to light our footsteps in the future through experience. The fact it did not arise thus far, however, does not by any means assure us of the fact it cannot happen—that a man cannot be put out of business by this kind of provision in the law.

Mr. COOPER. With all due deference, the experience under this program in the past has been such that we are convinced the gentleman's apprehension is not necessarily well founded.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Is it possible under this bill for a contractor to receive more than the contract price?

Mr. COOPER. Well, certain relief is provided in cases of that kind under the War Powers Act.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MILLS. The bill does not permit of the contractor receiving more under the terms of the bill than the original contract price. The gentleman from Michigan may have in mind a provision of the old War Powers Act which permitted a department of the Government to make a contractor whole, you might say.

Mr. COOPER. There is a provision in the War Powers Act that operates in the interest of the contractor, permitting the raising of the price or compensation, as well as reducing it.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I would think there should be for the reason that I recall that one or two companies were put out of business by a decision of the Federal agency. Take the case where, after a contract is made and performance is started, there is labor trouble and an increase in wages that may make it absolutely impossible for the contractor to go ahead and comply with the contract at the price of his bid. There should be something to take care of that.

Mr. COOPER. We think that that provision of the War Powers Act is ample to take care of that. After all, this contractor is voluntarily entering into the contract.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Oh, no.

Mr. COOPER. Oh, yes. He does not have to sign a contract. He does not have to sign a contract unless he wants to and unless the terms of it suit him.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, that may be allright as a matter of law and as a matter of theory. But, where is there a big industrial plant in this country that can sit back and refuse to go into war production?

Mr. COOPER. There is no compulsion by law to enter into war production.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Unless public opinion forces him. Suppose General Motors would not enter into a contract, what would happen?

Mr. COOPER. As a matter of law they do not have to unless they want to.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Sure, as a matter of law.

Mr. COOPER. We are talking about law here.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I think what is worrying us and I think what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GROSS] tried to put his finger on, is the fact that when a soldier enlists he is giving 100 percent, and what I think worries us is the statement in the bill that seems to confine it to preventing excessive profits. Is there anything in the bill to stop a company from saying to the Government, "We will do this without any profits at all, after adequate reserves. We do not want any profits on defense work any more than the soldier in Korea." Is there anything in this bill that would prevent any company—and I think this ought to be made clear generally—from saying to the Government, "We will do this job without profit"?

Mr. COOPER. No; there is nothing in the bill to prevent that. Bear this in mind. We are all opposed to excessive profits being made during wartime. Now, some have called attention to the fact that there is an excess-profits-tax law. Well now, some years ago one of the large banks in New York, I believe it was the National City Bank, certainly not a Government agency, made a very thorough investigation and they found that the application of the excess-profits-tax law only reached about 70 percent of the excess profits that were made. Therefore we have almost one-third of the excessive profits that are made during wartime that are not raeched by the excess-profits-tax law. Therefcre it is necessary to have a measure of this type to help protect the interest of the Government and prevent excessive profits being made and retained by those who entered into contracts with the Government.

Mr. JAVITS. And there is nothing to stop a feeling on the part of some firms in American business to go even further than that as far as defense production contracts are concerned; we all will understand the situation of firms that may not be able to do so and no one will doubt because of that their desire to do all they can, too, in the mobilization effort, but the door should be open to those which feel they can operate without profit after adequate reserves.

Mr. COOPER. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I asked for this time only because of the remarks made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS]. Some folks—the gentleman says he is not one of them—seem to think there is no patriotism in industry or in the stockholders of companies which produce. I just want to call this fact to the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS] that last time we were fighting a war the Ford Motor Co. had a contract but agreed to do and did the work without $1 of profit. And, in my district in Michigan quite a number of manufacturers went along just as patriotically as anyone could without any effort to get a war profit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, there has been no disposition on the part of the Republicans on the Committee on Ways and Means or the Republicans in the Congress that I know of to delay the passage of this legislation. In fact we are all in favor of the principle and hope that the execution of the law will be fair. But, nobody has laid claim to perfection. Nobody claims that this legislation cannot be amended and cannot be perfected. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JONAS] raises a very pertinent question and, if I may have the privilege to say what I want, I suggest to those who will carry this measure to the other body that they give full study to the proposition raised by the gentleman from Illinois, because the language on page 13 indicates clearly, at least by implication, that a contractor or subcontractor who has been disappointed and not satisfied with the decision of the Board can go immediately to the Tax Commission and indicate his desire to appeal from the decision of the Board and thereby stay the issuance of an execution to enforce the action of the Board. All execution would thereby be stopped. That is the only fair interpretation you can give that sentence on page 13, because the paragraph is intended to protect the contractor but it does not do so in view of the sentence on page 33.

The sentence on page 33, as I remember it, comes to us out of the old law. That sentence is a positive statement. Let me read it to you. "The filing of a petition under this section shall not operate to stay the execution of an order of the Board," and so forth. If the execution cannot be stayed the results might be as indicated by the gentleman from Chicago. For that reason, we ought to take consideration of this matter. While it may be that we cannot amend it today, and I know that the drafting force cannot do everything in a minute, I want Judge JONAS, if he will, to bear with us, and let us stick together and have this matter corrected in the other body if we can. It ought to be done. If it can be reached by an amendment in this body today I think it should be done and I will support such an amendment if the gentleman will offer it.

Mr. JONAS. That suits me.

Mr. JENKINS. This matter of renegotiation is a comparatively new proposition in legislation. Those of you who are lawyers know that great sanctity is given to a contract in our law. Contracts properly entered into can be enforced. The law of the land will aid in the enforcement of valid contracts in spite of this general principle, but we today will pass a law providing for renegotiation of contracts. In other words it would appear that we pass a law that will prevent the execution of a contract. However, this bill is not as harsh as it sounds, because in the preparation of the contracts the contractors are given the right and the privilege to know that they must expect renegotiation. A fair renegotiation law if fairly administered will be to the advantage of the contractor and to the Government. Renegotiation as it is applied in this bill means a recapitulation of costs and profits both. It works both ways. In the law it is specifically laid out in three or four paragraphs that the contracts will be entered into in all candor, all sincerity, realizing this one fact, that the Government is calling upon the people to produce war materials under very serious circumstances, under circumstances that require speed and require sacrifices.

Special consideration will be given to the efficiency of the contractor and his employees and special consideration will be given to any unusual risk that the contractor will be required to assume. It is not the intention of the Government to put anybody over the hotpan and take from him what he is rightfully entitled to by way of compensation. On the contrary, it is not the intention that the Government will lose by unfair and unreasonable prices and great profits, when those two situations can be reached by a meeting of the minds of both groups.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I gladly yield to my friend, the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. JENSEN. When the gentleman speaks about renegotiation of contracts, I presume he means a contract that is entered into between the Government and a company or an individual for a specific amount for the performance of that contract?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes. Any contract that has been entered into by one of the departments of the Government named in the bill such as the Army and the Navy, and so forth.

Mr. JENSEN. We have contracts entered into by the Government with plants and individuals on a cost-plus-a-fixed-fee basis.

Does this bill put a limit on the fixed fees that can be paid to a contractor.

Mr. JENKINS. This bill is a bill unto itself. It provides that the contracts may be renegotiated, and gives to the contractor every advantage that comes with expertness, with skill and efficiency, and with applicability to business, and so on. If a contractor has a continuing flow of business with the Government, that will be taken into consideration, of course, as they deal day by day, in order to get material produced for the benefit of the Government.

Mr. JENSEN. But what if it is a contract on a cost-plus-a-fixed-fee basis?

Mr. JENKINS. I cannot tell the gentleman exactly how such contracts will intermesh with this bill. My judgment is that if a contract is made positively and conclusively and independently from any continuing contract and is strictly a cost-plus-a-fixed-fee-basis contract, that it is covered and included by this bill. This bill only covers contracts made with certain departments of Government with reference to certain matters. It does not cover all Government contracts. For instance, the Post Office is not included as one of the departments to which this law will apply. It does not include contracts for the buying of stamps, paper, and things like that. Those are not included. But these military and semimilitary contracts are all included. The bill states specifically what departments are included, and then contains a provision that the President can include other departments if he so announces. That is about the best answer I can give the gentleman.

Mr. JENSEN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. McGREGOR. I appreciate the gentleman's statement, but I wonder if this group of individuals is covered by renegotiation. Suppose a contractor in competition with other contractors bids for the manufacture of a product for our Government.

Mr. JENKINS. Yes, I can answer the gentleman. It will be covered.

Mr. McGREGOR. Then, is that not putting a penalty upon the efficiency of that particular organization? I wonder if the Government would give him additional money should he lose.

Mr. JENKINS. The Government does not guarantee a profit to all those with which it contracts. If the Government has a continuance of similar contracts with one company and the contractor yields to the Government in some cases, then it might be that the Government could yield to the contractor if the contracts were somewhat interdependent. But, again, the language will prevail, because I know of a case which came up a few days ago. If that contractor enters into that contract with the Government he will be renegotiated. But as to just what may be done in the contract the gentleman has in mind, I do not know, because the language would cover it. Generally speaking, I am sure it would be included.

Mr. McGREGOR. What I am referring to is when the contractor goes in and in competition with other contractors meets the specifications and bids upon a unit price, and then you come along and renegotiate and say to him, "Because of your efficiency you have made a certain percentage of profit, yet we are going to force you to return to the Government that percentage." I think it is very unfair if you are going to make it applicable to those who bid and not make it applicable to those companies that have negoiated contracts on a cost-plus-fixed-fee basis.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. MILLS. The bill does apply to both types of contract. But I would like to call the attention of my friend, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McGREGOR] to the standards which are written in the bill beginning at line 25 on page 4 where the efficiency of the contractor must be taken into consideration in the renegotiation of contracts.

Mr. McGREGOR. Then, as I understand it, the committee determines whether or not he has been efficient.

Mr. MILLS. There is no hard and fast rule. It would have to be determined by the board, of course.

Mr. McGREGOR. In the gentleman's opinion, it will be applicable to negotiated contracts as well as bid contracts?

Mr. MILLS. Absolutely.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. JENSEN. Is the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLS] completely satisfied that this bill as now written takes care of negotiated contracts on a cost-plus-fixed-fee basis?

Mr. MILLS. Absolutely. Certainly it takes care of that kind of contract.

Mr. JENSEN. You mean, then, that if the Government enters into a contract with an individual or company for manufacturing goods on a cost-plus-fixed-fee contract for the construction of a building or the sale of cloth goods or anything else that you might mention, if the Government determines it is proper and feasible to negotiate that contract, they have authority under this bill to renegotiate that contract?

Mr. MILLS. That type of contract is made subject to renegotiation under the bill.

Mr. JENSEN. Specifically?

Mr. MILLS. It applies to all types of contracts.

Mr. JENSEN. But it does not mention cost-plus-fixed-fee.

Mr. MILLS. No; but this is clearly within the scope of contracts subject to the bill.

Mr. JENKINS. I am glad that the able gentleman from Arkansas agrees with me. The gentleman is one of the best authorities in this House on matters relating to the laws on renegotiation of contracts. In addition to what the gentleman from Arkansas has said let me say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. JENSEN] and my friend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McGREGOR], let me say that a renegotiation of a contract will not be as drastic to the contractor as the law applicable to the collection of excess-profits taxes. Suppose this did not apply to the contracts to which my friends refer. Then they could be renegotiated for excess profits.

This renegotiation law is intended to take the place of the excess-profits tax in many cases. If your man could get clear outside of this law then he would be subject to the excess-profits tax.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. HOLMES. There still is one point, of course, which the gentleman from Iowa must understand, and that is that this does not go below the $100,000 minimum. But as far as covering the cost-plus-fixed-fee contracts versus the competitive-bid contract, this legislation covers both. In World War II the competitive-bid contracts were around 75 percent of the total contracts let, with about 25 to 30 percent under cost-plus.

We have information and testimony before the committee that the percentage of cost-plus contracts will be very much less than that in the coming defense program, because they propose to put most of the contracts on competitive bids. However, regardless of whether it is cost-plus or competitive bids, this piece of legislation covers it.

Mr. JENKINS. I thank my friend, the able gentleman from Washington, for his very pertinent statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to develop one other point, if I may. I say this by way of encouragement to the Members of Congress and to the people of the country. The first renegotiation law passed and put into operation several years ago was a little short of an abomination in its enforcement. Its enforcement was ruthless and in many cases was very unfair. Many persons who were not familiar with Government contracts and Government procedure were imposed upon shamefully. I am glad that this was not a universal fact in all sections of the country but it was entirely too general. Many persons and corporations were unfairly treated. The result of this unfair enforcement was that the Congress of the United States, through the Ways and Means Committee, took the matter up a second time and we amended that law. In that consideration we adopted this new provision, which provides for a hearing before the Tax Court. I am proud to say that I had a little something to do with that, because there were many people in my district who felt terribly aggrieved. The inspectors would come out into the communities and go into the offices of small companies and some large companies and arbitrarily fix their own figures, which in many cases were unjust. The law was not written so as to give an aggrieved person plain and adequate relief. In many cases the individual did not know how to protect himself or what to do. However, I am glad to say that the Ways and Means Committee came up with legislation that provided what I think was adequate and quick relief to every contractor. This legislation provided that where a contractor was not satisfied with the decison of the Board, he could go into the Tax Court and could go in de novo; the lawyers will understand what de novo means, but the average layman might not know. It means that he could go into the court and start all over new. He could take a fresh start. He could go in and show all the evidence he had before, and everything else that he could dig up, everything that he could get that was probative, and would tend to prove his point.

This bill presently before us provides for an appeal to the Tax Court. This is a fine provision and this guarantees the aggrieved person his day in court. But the gentleman from Illinois raises a serious question as to whether he can get into the Tax Court soon enough. If this bill is not amended as I have heretofore suggested, I would advise an aggrieved person to go in immediately to the Tax Court, and file his exception to the decision of the Board. That will stop all abuses, I think. That will give the Tax Court complete jurisdiction of the matter.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Did the committee consider at any time the question of amortization in connection with this bill?

Mr. JENKINS. Well, the subject of amortization is not fully and completely taken up in this bill. I mean we do not try to amend the amortization law in this bill. I know that amortization will be considered, however, in making these renegotiations. I would prefer, and I think the gentleman would prefer to have amortization considered in legislation which deals exclusively with amortization. Because amortization does not deal with profits. It deals with costs. In other words a man or company that has constructed big improvements primarily to perform war contracts wants the costs of his plant amortized over 5 years. This is taken care of in a law especially drawn for that purpose. This law which we are presently considering primarily deals with profits.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. MILLS. I would like to call to the attention of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO] page 6, line 5, where provision is made for all allowances as deductions and exclusions under chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code to be taken, as set forth here for purposes of renegotiation. That includes amortization. The gentleman from Ohio will recall that in connection with the Revenue Act of 1950 we passed a speed-up of amortization, providing for 5 years amortization.

Mr. JENKINS. Yes. Of course, amortization applies to many contracts that are not covered by this bill. We should leave the amortization law as it is.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield further at that point?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. The last bill on amortization left much to be desired, because only big firms that had a staff of lawyers who could protect that firm took advantage of it and obtained their certificates of necessity. The little firms did not know how to do it, or it was not done, with the result that they went out of business or went bankrupt. That should be corrected in the new bill.

Mr. JENKINS. That is true, but that is true in life in many instances, the weak get weaker and weaker. But in the consideration of this bill our primary purpose is to encourage the production of war material of all kinds as speedily and as efficiently as possible. If to do so it is advisable to grant amortization privileges to a company that is operating under a contract that must be renegotiated then there is no reason why this privilege should not be given to him. I know that the gentleman from Michigan is absolutely right when he says that in the last war many failed to get the advantages of amortization because they did not know about it and did not know how to avail themselves of its advantages.

Mr. DONDERO. And we ought to protect the weak fellow. During the course of our consideration of the last tax bill we agreed with Members of another body that this whole question of a speedy amortization would be reviewed by our committee in connection with the tax bill of this year.

Mr. GROSS. This renegotiation is on a purely speculative basis; that is the Board can renegotiate or not renegotiate at its discretion and pleasure; is that right?

Mr. JENKINS. No; that is not the purpose of the legislation. The Board is bound to renegotiate all contracts that are covered by the law. It is not bound to consider all Government contracts. It is bound to consider all Government contracts of a certain class and standard made with certain departments of the Government. Of course it might fail to reach some cases but its powers and duties are expressly set out in the bill. I do not expect any controversy on that score.

Mr. GROSS. But it is purely on a selective basis.

Mr. JENKINS. No; it treats everybody in the designated categories the same. There is no way by which any special persons will get any special favors unless some one violates his duty. The Ways and Means Committee was expressly interested in seeing that this Board acted fairly for the law provides that the board should not be packed by interested parties; and it compels the President to select three out of the five members of the Board from civilian life to prevent the Board from being packed by Army or Navy officials or by any of the big contracting companies of the country.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CAMP].

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can add anything to what has been said heretofore except to say, in the words of the gentleman from Michigan who spoke a moment ago, that the industry of our country will accept this bill patriotically. Of course, renegotiation of contracts is as harsh a remedy as an American could imagine. Americans in their daily business lives are used to making contracts and living up to them. Here is an instance where they make a contract with their Government for a certain performance to make or manufacture a certain thing or to furnish the Government certain supplies at a certain price; but under this harsh law which we are enacting they may at any time be called into the Government office and told that they must change the price. It is not, therefore, Mr. Chairman, a tax law by any means at all; it is a price law, a price-fixing law, and it is about the only thing that we can do in these critical times to insure our people that the Government in its haste to arm itself, to build armament to defend us, in the great rush that there will be in the production of supplies of all kinds, cannot under any circumstances know just what a just and proper price will be. We could tell you instance after instance that occurred in the Second World War where contracts were made and the contractors voluntarily came to the Department and said: "Here, the price is too high; we can make this gun or this piece of airplane at a very much cheaper price"; and we have one instance where a contractor came and voluntarily returned something like a million dollars.

I have in mind an instance that occurred in my own district, an old steel fabricator, who had furnished supplies for three wars, entered into a contract to furnish parts of Liberty ships. He came to Washington and to my office. I asked him where he had been. He said: "Why, I came up here to the Renegotiation Board." I asked him if he was satisfied, and he said, "Perfectly." I asked him who represented him and he said, "I just came myself and brought my bookkeeper along. They treated me fair; I am all right."

Most of the experience of our business people were like that, although there were people who felt that they had not had a square deal and had been treated harshly. To help those cases we have provided for appeal to the Tax Court.

This bill is even more drastic than the one we had before. Under the other law we did not renegotiate contracts that were less in amount than $500,000; under this the limit is $100,000. I worry sometimes over the fact that I cannot see how they can get around to renegotiating all of them. When you get down to $100,000 you will multiply greatly the work of the Renegotiation Board.

There are certain provisions in this law that were not in the other law.

For instance, I was under the impression that the established market price of the raw material on the day the contract was made should suffice, and that you should not renegotiate beyond that. But this bill goes back to the actual producer of that raw product. However, bear in mind it cannot hurt them because the bill provides that they shall have a reasonable profit; and in times like these that is all any patriotic American should want.

There should be no crop of millionaires from contracts involving defense materials in this great emergency. The Committee on Ways and Means and this Congress will be commended for passing promptly at the beginning of the present session this Renegotiation Act. When you couple that action with the excess-profits law which we have already passed, and with the new tax law that the committee will begin hearings on next week, I believe the people will willingly bear this heavy burden of taxation which must fall upon their shoulders. But if after taxing them to the extent we are going to tax them they should wake up and find a crop of millionaires growing out of these Government contracts, I do not think we would ever get over the condemnation we would receive. So I say the Congress should pass this bill promptly.

I do not know that I have anything further to add to what has been said.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the gentleman know of any place in the record in connection with World War II operations where any firm was maliciously mistreated by the renegotiation machinery of gover ment?

Mr. CAMP. I certainly do not, and I think the renegotiation groups were composed of some of the best and most reasonable businessmen in this country. Business and industry helped to supply the men who did the renegotiating.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I was going to ask if it is not true that most of these renegotiating teams, or squads as we might call them, were taken from business and were constituted by practical businessmen?

Mr. CAMP. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Inside the industry in which they were working.

Mr. CAMP. Yes; and industry as a whole was satisfied. My district is an industrial one, and I have not received a single letter or word indicating any opposition to this Renegotiation Act.

Mr. CRAWFORD. One other question. Where industry is going out manufacturing new items the like of which have never gone over a production line whatever in any place of business, does the gentleman in his experience as a member of the Ways and Means Committee know of a more equitable way in which to arrive at a fair price for the producer and a fair price for the taxpayer, the Government, than through renegotiated contracts?

Mr. CAMP. I certainly do not, and I think that explains the situation very adroitly and very clearly. It is the only way that we can arrive at what is a fair price to the manufacturer and to the country, and this, I would like to say in my closing remarks, is not a tax law but is a pricing law—a fair pricing act.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VORYS. I find that all contracts for raw materials, apparently, such as agricultural products, minerals, and timber, are exempt from the provisions of the bill. Why is that?

Mr. CAMP. They are not exempt except to the producer himself, and they are only exempt in their raw and original form.

Mr. VORYS. Why is that?

Mr. CAMP. Why are they exempt?

Mr. VORYS. Yes.

Mr. CAMP. Well, the producer of raw material, cotton, for instance, or wheat or corn, does not enter into a contract with the Government. You renegotiate with the subcontractor and the contractor right down to the farmer himself.

Mr. VORYS. I do not see why you might not want to review a contract for raw materials that were overpriced as well as anything else. I just do not know why they should be exempt entirely. I can see why the Board is given this discretion and authority to exempt certain kinds of contracts, but why are they forbidden to consider raw materials?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. CAMP. In the other act—and we tried to amend this act to conform to it—we fixed the raw-material price at the prevailing market price on the day the contract was entered into. But I understand that this Board will use that as a criterion in renegotiating under this act.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I would say in answer to the international statement made by the gentleman from Ohio that experience has demonstrated that the original producer never did have an excess profit. Did you not know that? He never did have.

Mr. TACKETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. TACKETT. In World War II we were encouraging the mining of manganese. Are the operators of those mines that are taking the chance that they need to take during the emergency exempt from this bill?

Mr. CAMP. That is considered in the general rule and in the criteria set out in the bill. That is considered, and they are allowed a profit in accordance with the risk they take.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, as a matter of fact, manganese ore, which has not been processed, is exempt under the terms of the bill.

Mr. CAMP. That is right. All raw materials are.

Mr. TACKETT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, the gentleman says, though, that manganese ore production comes under the general category. That was the situation in World War II, and you will recall that all the contractors were taken care of in this country except those which produced the vital metals that were needed in war production.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. CAMP. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. There was no producer of any vital material renegotiated in the last war.

Mr. TACKETT. That is right.

Mr. MILLS. All raw materials from the mines were exempt from renegotiation in the last war.

Mr. CAMP. Well, they are under this bill.

Mr. MILLS. Exactly.

Mr. TACKETT. Well, should they be? That is the question.

Mr. CAMP. Yes; they should be.

Mr. TACKETT. Why should they be, if we are going to encourage them to mine these metals, and then they go out and produce and are unable to make a fair return? Why are they not entitled to renegotiation?

Mr. CAMP. The reason raw materials and agricultural products are exempt is because their price can be ascertained any minute of any day on stock and commodity exchanges all over the world; not only in America, but all over the world. You can go out there right now and see what cotton is worth in Liverpool, Memphis, New Orleans, or Savannah. It is ascertainable, and they can be satisfied.

Mr. TACKETT. I am in error. I was thinking that this legislation was not only for the purpose of protecting the Government but also to protect the production contractors. I now see that this is one-street legislation needed to protect the Government and that other legislation will be needed to encourage mining of vital metals.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman just developed one thing that I wanted to bring out. Supposing corporation A owns 100,000 acres of fine timber and the Government wishes to take a certain board footage off of that company's property. Also, suppose the price is set on such products at the time through the price control machinery. There would simply be no sense in renegotiating the contract, would there?

Mr. CAMP. That is right. We discussed it in committee. The law itself is as far back as you can go there. You cannot go to the price that man paid for a tract of timber 20 years ago. That is capital gain, that is not contract profit.

Mr. CRAWFORD. On the other hand, if a manufacturer of wood products makes a contract with the Government to build 1,000,000 cartridge cases, where he goes to that company and buys the lumber, then the cartridge case contract is subject to renegotiation, because there is no fixed price on cartridge cases.

Mr. CAMP. That is right.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CURTIS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, one of the most important pillars in our entire private enterprise system is the right of contract, the right of people to enter into a contract and have that contract enforced and have it not nullified by any government anywhere. Renegotiation in a very real sense violates that principle. It says in effect that even though our citizens enter into a contract with the Government, if after it is over the Government feels that too much money has been made the contract can be renegotiated or rewritten. I believe that in a period of national emergency that violation, if you choose to call it that, of the principle of contract is necessary. It is a sort of necessary evil. But certainly it should be administered with care and justice and the people who administer it should be watched constantly.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. What would happen if the contractor sustained a loss as a result of the contract?

Mr. CURTIS of Nebraska. There is no relief for him.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HOLMES. Under the War Powers Act there is provision to take into consideration the losses experienced by these contractors under specific contracts. They are negotiated up or bailed out from their loss on a reasonable base period.

Mr. CURTIS of Nebraska. That applies to only a few. For instance, out in my State many farmers near a flood-control project have sold their land to the Government. It is very likely the Government may find oil under that land. Can those farmers come in and say, "Here, the Government got too good a bargain. Can we not renegotiate the sale price?" No, it is a one-way street running in favor of the Government.

I do not want to be misunderstood. In this time of increased national defense buying it is necessary that the Government do a lot of blind contracting. Time is important. They must go to the manufacturers and say, "We want this and we want it now." Neither the manufacturers nor the procurement agencies have any idea what would be a just price. It may be that a price may appear to be a just price now, but if the volume is increased several times or several hundred times a fair price would be much lower. So it does seem that it is proper for a sovereign government to say, "We are not going to make these contracts final. They will have to be rewritten or renegotiated in the light of all the costs."

I am going to support this bill, but I believe if there ever was a measure where they should follow established principles of law and accounting, where everyone should be treated the same, it is this law. It does offer possibilities for favoritisms. I hope the Congress under the power which it has asserted for itself in the Congressional Reorganization Act will keep a very watchful eye on the operation of this law.

This law speaks too much about profits and not enough about prices. There is a tendency in the bill to say that the contractor or manufacturer who sells something to the Government, even though the Government pays too much for it, if he does not show a profit it is O. K. In other words, in order to get proper pricing they have accepted as a measuring stick the amount of profit. Ordinarily that may be all right, but if you have a very inefficient manufacturer, one whose plant and whose management is not what it should be, and if the salaries of the officers have been high for years they probably can charge the Government too high a price for some item and not be renegotiated. If the auditors find there has been no excess profit the taxpayers have no relief even though the Government paid too much. On the other hand some small well-managed companies with modest salaries for their officers, with good officers who watch everything, who are diligent and who cut down the cost, may sell that same article to the Government for a much lower price and because they do show a substantial profit they are renegotiated. I hope in administering this law the Government will encourage efficiency and not encourage inefficiency, that they will encourage the holding down of costs and not put a premium on that contractor or manufacturer who makes his costs very high. It should be construed as a pricing law rather than as a profits law. In other words, the Government should not pay more than something is worth even if the contractor by reason of his own inefficiency does not make a profit. By the same token if a successful and careful manufacturer reduced the prices way way below all other competitors, he ought to have a little reward for that because the Government benefits. The Government buys cheaper and he will pay more taxes under our excess-profits-tax law and the ordinary tax laws.

This bill differs from our previous law in several particulars. It sets up an independent board, a five-man board, the appointment of which must be made with the advice and consent of the Senate, and not more than two of them are to be military men. They have authority to delegate and redelegate and redelegate the authority granted in this bill, so that the Government agents who go into various manufacturing plants of the country will have authority to speak for the United States Government and determine whether or not the contract should be rewritten. The old law was more or less silent on the question of interest, although interest was charged in some instances where the manufacturers doubted the propriety thereof. This law spells it out a little more. One rather small change, but yet important, is that this new bill brings within the purview of renegotiation the acts of the so-called 5-percenters, those people who are engaged in contract brokering. After all, they get their money from the taxpayers of the United States. If an honest, patriotic manufacturer seeking to produce an efficient and low-cost defense item for the Government is subject to renegotiation, certainly that group here in Washington, some of whom render service and are honest, but some of whom are merely engaged in peddling influence, should not be permitted to gain great sums from out of the defense program and not be renegotiated. This law brings the contract brokers within the purview of the renegotiation if they make in any one year in excess of $25,000.

I believe that the power vested in this bill is so great that there should be an appeal beyond the appeal provided to the Tax Court. Objection has been raised to that. We are told that it is an administrative matter; that it is a matter that calls for discretion to determine how much the Government should pay for a certain article. Nevertheless, I feel that we are on such dangerous ground in tampering with the right of contract that it should be safeguarded in every way and that anyone aggrieved should have access to the courts of the land. I regret that the bill does not so provide. My amendment for such appeals, as well as my amendment to place ECA contracts under the renegotiation law, was rejected by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I favor the enactment of H. R. 1724 which is now before us. Generally, throughout the country, business and industrial leaders recognize the need for effective legal provision for the renegotiation of defense contracts. The American people in general look to the Federal Government to provide a stronger instrument for renegotiation of defense contracts in order to eliminate excessive profits from war production. The present law and procedures are inadequate. They do not apply to all defense orders placed by the Department of Defense, Army, Navy, Air Force, Commerce, the General Services Administration, the Atomic Energy Commission, and other similar agencies, and they do not reach many contractors and subcontractors who should come within the jurisdiction of the renegotiation law.

Our great task in developing H. R. 1724, to provide for the renegotiation of contracts, has been to prevent excessive profits and high costs on defense business without discouraging expansion of production and the efficient use of manpower and materials in our preparedness program. Some regard had to be given to the practical limitations of administration and enforcement. For example, it is provided that a contractor or subcontractor shall not be renegotiated for any year unless he has received or accrued more than $100,000 in the year from such source, and subcontractors whose income is derived from certain fees or commissions will be renegotiated for any year in which they have receipts and accruals of $25,000 or more from such source. A further example is the case of production of raw materials on our farms and in our mining industry which could not be brought under renegotiation without creating such an immense load of work that it would jeopardize the success of the administration of the entire program of renegotiation. Furthermore, the importance of food and fiber and of the products of mine, oil or gas well, or other mineral or natural deposits makes it necessary to encourage expansion of such production in order to build our Nation's strength to withstand the impact of war.

You will note that section 101, starting on page 1 of the bill, sets out the declaration of policy. This declaration of policy recognizes and declares that the sound execution of the national defense program requires the elimination of excessive profits from contracts made with the United States and from related subcontracts in the course of said program and that this policy of the Congress, in the interest of national defense and the general welfare of the Nation, requires that such excessive profits be eliminated as provided in the proposed legislation. This declaration of policy limits the renegotiation to contracts for the procurement of property, processes, services, and the construction of facilities necessary for the national defense. It does not contemplate the renegotiation of all contracts made by all Government departments or agencies, but only those contracts and subcontracts made in the course of the national defense program.

However, as pointed out by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED], the provisions of section 102 are much broader and, unless changed by amendment, may be construed to apply to all contracts with the departments and agencies named.

Broad powers are given to the Renegotiation Board to exempt contracts or subcontracts which fall within the category specified in the bill. This has been done in the interest of reducing the work load of renegotiation at some points so that the major effort of the Board and its staff can be devoted to renegotiation of contracts and subcontracts in which the need for such renegotiation is greatest.

Some changes have been made in the mandatory exemptions as compared with the mandatory exemptions in the Renegotiation Act of 1943. One of these changes is found in section 106 (a) (4) on page 26 which sets out a more exact point for determining the exemption of contracts or subcontracts for timber and limits the exemption to timber which has not been processed beyond the form of logs and limits the exemption also to contracts or subcontracts made with the owner of the timber property or with the producer of the logs.

Another change is made with regard to the product of mines. At the suggestion of Under Secretary of War Robert Patterson, section 403 (i) (1) (B) of the 1943 act extended mandatory exemption to "any contract or subcontract for the product of a mine, oil or gas well, or other mineral or natural deposit, or timber, which has not been processed, refined, or treated beyond the first form or state suitable for industrial use." You will note that section 106 (a) (3), which appears on page 25 of this bill, extends the mandatory exemption to "any contract or subcontract for the product of a mine, oil or gas well, or other mineral or natural deposit, which has not been processed, refined, or treated beyond the ordinary treatment processes normally applied by producers in order to obtain the first commercially marketable product, but only if such contract or subcontract is with the owner or operator of the mine, well, or deposit from which such product is produced. The term, 'ordinary treatment processes,' means, in the case of the product of a mine, well, or deposit with respect to which an allowance for percentage depletion is provided by section 114 (b) (3) or (4) of the Internal Revenue Code, those processes which are taken into account under such section in computing gross income from the property, and in the case of any other product such term means such similar processes as may be prescribed under regulations promulgated by the Board."

If the proposed change in this mandatory exemption does not have an adverse effect on our national defense, I have no objection to its inclusion in this legislation, but since the adoption by the committee of this change in the exemption I have not had an opportunity to discuss the change with owners or representatives of our domestic mining industries nor with our Government officials who are charged with expediting domestic mine production and acquiring mine products for our national defense preparedness program. It is my hope that this change will receive very careful study and consideration by the other body to the end that Congress may avoid enactment of this provision if such study and analysis should establish that this provision may discourage or retard domestic production of these items at the very time they are most needed in our preparedness program. I am deeply sorry that the limitation of time did not permit the Committee on Ways and Means to make a more thorough and more careful study and examination of the possible impact of the proposed change on the domestic mining industry.

I am quite sure that Congress will be willing to consider amending this legislation whenever it is shown, either before its enactment or subsequent thereto, that this provision may have an effect detrimental to our national defense.

We had extensive hearings on this legislation, but the change I have referred to regarding mines and mine products was made in the very last part of our action in developing the bill, and I know that the committee is unanimous in wanting to do the right thing in building the defense preparedness program. We just did not have time to view it thoroughly after we made the proposed change in the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. BAILEY. In the hearings before the committee were there present representatives of the mine operators and unions?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Oh, yes. They advocated very strongly the retention of the wording of the 1943 act.

Mr. BAILEY. Which has been changed?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Exactly; and I want to know, in fairness to our defense program, what the actual impact of this change may be. I am not qualified to speak here and now about the extent of the effect of it or what it will do. If I had the time I would like to go into a very careful review of it with the owners and operators of our mining industry, and also with the Government authorities who have the responsibility for building up our preparedness program. I know the committee has that desire also. My suggestion is not adverse to the committee's attitude in any way on this point. I only hope it will be brought up more fully in the other body.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. What, if any, provision is made in this bill for contractors to write off part or all of their capital investment? I am thinking about a case like this: There is a shipbuilding concern in my district that operated during the last war, building ships for the Army. Since then the plant has been idle, but it is now being revamped at considerable expense to the contractor. He anticipates again entering into defense contracts. The cost of modernizing this plant will only be useful in the execution of defense contracts. There will probably be no use for the modernization for which the contractor expended money, after he has executed such war contracts as he may get. Consequently I am wondering if he will be able to recover a part or all of those costs, as obviously ordinary depreciation allowed by the revenue laws would not fit his case. All his profit would be eaten up by the capital expenditure which he had made to be able to take care of these defense contracts. Could the gentleman enlighten me on this problem and if possible point out what such a contractor might expect and specifically in what part of the law the appropriate relief, if any is due in such a case, is authorized?

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. The gentleman from California will find a provision in section 103 (f) applies to the situation he has outlined. It appears on page 6 of the bill as follows:

All items estimated to be allowable as deductions and exclusions under chapter I of the Internal Revenue Code (excluding taxes measured by income) shall, to the extent allocable to such contracts and subcontracts, be allowed as items of cost, except that no amount shall be allowed as an item of cost by reason of the application of a carry-over or carry-back. Such costs shall be determined in accordance with the method of cost accounting regularly employed by the contractor or subcontractor in keeping his books, but, if no such method of cost accounting has been employed, or if the method so employed does not, in the opinion of the Board, or, upon redetermination, in the opinion of the Tax Court of the United States, properly reflect such costs, such costs shall be determined in accordance with such method as in the opinion of the Board, or, upon redetermination, in the opinion of the Tax Court of the United States, does properly reflect such costs.

I commend the gentleman from California for his alert watchfulness on this point because it is of far-reaching importance in our gigantic preparedness program now getting under way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate that we must have a renegotiation law. I agree we should have it because of the situation in which we are placed as we proceed to rearm ourselves in preparation for war or, better yet, to prepare ourselves so that we may avoid war.

Renegotiation is temporary in nature, we hope. At best it can be said to show a weakness in our taxing laws which fail to take back from the individuals the excessive earnings they may have secured; at the same time it is an admission of weakness, a necessary weakness perhaps, but nevertheless a weakness and a failing and fallacy on the part of our contracting agencies of Government, representing as it does the taxpayers, based upon a showing of their inability to arrive at a fair and an equitable contract price for the products of industry. It causes consternation so far as the contractor of the job is concerned, because he never knows until perhaps 2 years after the completion of the contract just how much money he will have resulting from the contract, money which he may need to fulfill existing obligations or which he may need to provide for necessary expansion. Yet considering all of those factors, the committee, without any serious objection anywhere, brings this bill before you because we know that haste is necessary in order to secure quick rearmament of the country. It would do no good to sit idly by and let time pass as we seek one way or the other to determine what is a fair price for a product that we have not been manufacturing in the past, a product which is essential to the war effort.

So, we give the go ahead signal to industry, and the principals of the contract get together and after certain negotiations determine upon the best price they can which would induce the manufacturer to go ahead and produce the article, he agreeing that the contract shall be renegotiated under certain circumstances. I know, and it has been pointed out to you, that there is a grave danger that the man who operates the company which is most efficient, the company which stretches every point, the company which in every modern way endeavors to produce more quickly and cheaply, may be renegotiated downward and at the same time the inefficient producer producing that same article may not have his profits cut. However, the Board, which will be headed by a group of men who are confirmed and approved by the Senate after having been named by the President, must be presumed to be men who, first of all, want the rearmament program pushed to the utmost, must be men who are presumed to have the interest of our entire national economy at heart. It is the belief of the committee that the bill will be handled in a fair and equitable manner, and consequently we come before you with that bill and ask its adoption.

There is one phase of the bill that does not please me. I shall not offer an amendment, but there is a subject deserving further consideration. That is the question of whether the bill should be amended to exempt nondefense contracts. For many years we have adopted in our Government the principle of taking bids on contracts, particularly on these items that are everyday purchases. I see no reason whatever in providing that those items should be the subject of renegotiation. I think renegotiation, an unusual and an abnormal procedure, should be confined to those instances where it can be justified on the ground that the Government has been unable to reach a firm basis for a contract. In other words, I think the items which historically have been the subject of the ordinary type of contract between the Government and the American businessman should not be renegotiated under the guise that they are a part of our national defense program.

To continue that provision in the bill would impose a burden which would be, I believe, entirely unreasonable upon those charged with administering this bill, which is a most difficult one to administer. It would, perhaps, induce a measure of carelessness on the part of the Government agencies in issuing contracts in the original instance. We should keep those men, dealing as they are now with the items they have been purchasing in the past, on the firm basis of the customary way of making contracts. They should use their best judgment, deal across the table with the manufacturer who is under no particular pressure at this time to speed up his production. Let us make a firm contract in those instances. Let us direct that the independent board under this act shall confine its efforts to bringing back into the Treasury the truly excessive earnings which are the result of poor contract making, which is necessary in this time of tension by reason of the pressure upon the Government agencies. They must remember always that those agencies are called upon to secure firm contracts for the manufacture of articles never before seen or heard of; remember that no manufacturer knows what it will cost to make that article. Let us remove from the scope of this bill those items which we have been buying for years, and permit the men who are the renegotiators to confine their efforts to the items which are a part of our national defense program. I think such an amendment would be unobjectionable to the Government agencies which are interested in this bill. I think certainly the efficiency of the bill will be greatly improved. I think the public will be more willing to accept the principle that a contract once made can be reopened and renegotiated if it is confined to the principal cause for this bill's being here, namely, that in a time of pressure due to the frailties of mankind and the lack of knowledge about the matters under contract, and because of haste in particular, a contract has to be entered into which is not final in its conception. Let us confine this bill to that type of contract. Thereby industry will have a measure of certainty it cannot have under this bill, and thereby, I am sure, the efficiency of the Renegotiation Board charged with administering this act will be greatly improved, and the return to the Treasury of money belonging there will be expedited. Let us not tie the hands of the Board by directing that on any and every contract exceeding $100,000 the Renegotiation Board shall send their investigators to determine whether the price was a fair and an equitable one.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EBERHARTER. There is something in what the gentleman says, but I think the bill does give the Board discretionary power. As is stated on page 4 of the report:

> The Board is given discretionary authority to exempt contracts or subcontracts which fall within the categories specified in the bill. These include contracts to be performed outside the United States, certain contracts and subcontracts where the profits can be determined with reasonable certainty when the contract price is established.

There are a couple of other provisions there where the Board is given discretion.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. That is correct. There is discretion in the Board to exempt any contract.

Mr. EBERHARTER. So the Board is not under the compulsion of renegotiating any contract whatsoever.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman for the correction. He is right in that respect. The Board could exempt any one of these. I see no reason, however, why the statute itself should necessitate a contractor's being uncertain about his status, and I see no reason, further, why we should not simply eliminate nondefense contracts.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT].

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

"YES-MAN PSYCHOLOGY"

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, a practice which strikes at the very heart of our national defense is embodied in the recent directive of the administration which restricts officers of our Military Establishment in giving to Congress and the American people valuable information based on their years of experience.

On November 15, 1946, in a memorandum to the Director of the Budget, the President said:

> I wish you would include a reminder that I shall expect them and their subordinates to support only the President's estimates in hearings and discussions with Members of Congress.

The President was addressing himself to the heads of all Government agencies, including the Military Establishment.

On January 20, 1951, the following confidential directive was issued:

> Officers may, upon their own responsibility, and at their own discretion, make remarks concerning unclassified matters on foreign or military policies to selected groups for background purposes only and not for publication without obtaining prior clearance, provided that their remarks are confined to the bounds and policies which have been publicly announced by the White House, State or Defense Departments.

Mr. Chairman, in 1946 the directive said support only the President's estimates. On January 20, 1951, the directive said confine your remarks to the bounds of the policies which have been publicly announced by the administration. This is an out-and-out gag on our military spokesmen. No wonder we were unprepared for Korea.

Let us not forget the shameful treatment accorded Admiral Louis Denfeld, the transfer of Admiral Joel T. Boone, Gen. Orville Anderson, and others, simply because they spoke their minds and gave to the American people the results of their years of experience in military life.

Mr. Chairman, this "yes-man psychology" is the ruination of good government and especially of our national defense.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. WERDEL].

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Chairman, I take this short time for the reason that I believe a clear statement should appear in the RECORD while his bill is being considered, advising the American small-business man that there is nothing in this bill which permits renegotiation of Government contracts for his benefit. The businessman who has lost money in his contracts with the Government must still find in the War Powers Act his rights to relief if they exist. I believe there is a general false belief that the bill we are considering purports to make corrections for all inequities experienced in the last war in regard to renegotiation of contracts, including those where the contracting party lost money. This is not the case. The rules and regulations under the War Powers Act, which caused so much damage to small contractors and subcontractors because of technicalities, are still in operation and effect. As an example, the rule of the last war that executives' salaries would be considered as costs of a contractor, if his business entity was in the form of a corporation, but living expenses of a partner doing business as a partnership entity would not be considered as costs, is still in effect. The record should be clear today that businessmen seeking Government contracts or seeking a subcontract from a larger business concern, should seek advice from their attorneys in regard to their business entity and what their rights may be, in the event of loss under the War Powers Act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] a little while ago brought up the question of what I think about the patriotism of American industry. I made the statement I did because I wanted to show that there was in the American private economy a great area of patriotism and that many companies are, I believe, ready to give up all profits on defense contracts after providing for their reserves.

I would like to emphasize one further point: The productivity of American industry will determine whether or not we will defeat communism because, unless our private economy can produce 25 percent more in the next 5 years than it produced in the last 5 years since 1945, we are in grave danger of losing the grim struggle to defend freedom in which we are engaged. I am confident that the American private economy—workers and management alike—can do it.

It is this kind of support evidenced on the floor of the House by members of such diverse opinions as the gentleman from Michigan and myself which may indeed help American industry to accomplish this goal for our benefit and for the benefit of free peoples everywhere.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the members of the committee have already had the opportunity of reaching a fair understanding at least, of the provisions of the bill before us today. We have heard it adequately explained by those who preceded me. I do not desire to go into a detailed explanation of all the provisions of the bill within the 15 minutes allotted to me. However, I would like to take up one or two points about which there appears to be some question in the minds of some of those who have spoken.

All of us will recall that this idea of renegotiation is not a new thing. It has never been treated as a partisan matter. I remember the first suggestion for renegotiation prior to or during World War II was made by our former colleague from South Dakota, who is now in the other body, Mr. CASE. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] and I served on a subcommittee which prepared amendments to the Renegotiation Act of 1943. A great deal of credit is due to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] for the method of appeal provided in the World War II law and many of the other wholesome provisions of that law.

This bill that we have before us today is based largely on the old 1943 Renegotiation Act, plus experience gained by those who renegotiated contracts during World War II. The big difference, at least in my opinion, between our World War II renegotiation law and the bill before us, is the Renegotiation Board itself. In the World War II act, because of assurance given our committee by Judge Patterson, who was then Secretary of War, that the renegotiation of contracts would be conducted in an independent manner, it was not felt necessary to make an independent agency of the Renegotiation Board. However, I felt then that it should have been independent, and I felt during the discussion of this present bill in the committee that the Renegotiation Board itself should be independent. In other words, those who renegotiated contracts should not be under the control of the same group in either the Air Force, the Army, or the Navy, who procured the articles in question in the first place.

This Board is to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It is to consist of five members, not less than three of whom must come from civilian life. As I understand, the President may appoint any three civilians he desires to appoint. They may come from outside Government or they may come from within Government. It is not intended by this limitation that the President shall appoint two from the armed services. He may appoint all five from civilian life, if he so desires. To me, that is an improvement over our World War II renegotiation law.

We hope that this provision will mean uniformity of decisions, uniformity of regulations, and uniformity of application of renegotiation. During World War II we heard that it was possible for one contractor to receive one kind of treatment at the hands of the Navy renegotiation and entirely different treatment at the hands of the Army and the Air Force. It is our hope that there will be uniformity as a result of this independent agency in the executive department handling the renegotiations. A question has arisen as to whether or not there should be any exceptions or exemptions whatsoever to the authority in the legislation to renegotiate contracts.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. May I suggest to the gentleman that in the course of the study made by the Air Policy Board a while back we found that contractors dealing with the various branches of the service and, of course, also that the General Accounting Office and the Bureau of Internal Revenue had in effect to keep five separate books because of different aspects of the situation. I am wondering if it would not save a great deal of expense to the Government if we could eventually agree upon one form of accounting?

Mr. MILLS. That is one of the things that should be carefully considered. Certainly we are endeavoring to overcome that in this bill.

There is the right, as the gentleman knows, in section 107 (d) of the bill to delegate authority; that is, the Board may delegate its authority, its obligations, and responsibilities except that it cannot delegate its authority to make rules and regulations. The Board may delegate back to the Air Force or to the Army or to the Navy the responsibility for renegotiation of those contracts which the agency makes. But in the process of renegotiating those contracts the agencies will be controlled and they will operate under rules and regulations which are uniform; and, of course, the Board itself will have the final authority in the event it desires to review any such contract or renegotiation, or if the contractor, himself, wants to go to the Board.

Mr. HINSHAW. Could the gentleman give any assurance that those regulations will be uniform with the Internal Revenue Bureau as well as the General Accounting Office?

Mr. MILLS. I do not believe I follow the gentleman, but the Internal Revenue Bureau is not in this now.

Mr. HINSHAW. No, but the gentleman will recognize that the Internal Revenue Bureau figures out the taxes to be paid on profits on the contracts.

Mr. MILLS. There should be uniformity as far as costs are concerned that are allowed for renegotiation and costs that are allowed for tax purposes. On page 6 of the bill we suggest that all items of cost allowable under the tax laws will be allowed for renegotiation purposes. But I do not know that you can say that there would be absolute uniformity between all of the operations of the renegotiation law and the application of the internal revenue laws.

Mr. HINSHAW. I think the gentleman can see how much cheaper it would be to do the accounting for all concerned if only one set of books need be kept.

Mr. MILLS. That is true, and we hope that only one set of books will be necessary for tax purposes, as well as for purposes of renegotiation; it would be much cheaper for the contractor.

When my friend from California arose I had started to say something about this question of exemptions. In the 1943 act, the old World War II law, we provided specific exemptions for raw products grown on the farm, and those produced from mines and oil and gas wells. We did that at the request of those people charged with the responsibility of renegotiating these contracts. They said then it was administratively difficult, if not impossible, to go back into all of these subcontracts involving raw materials, and to renegotiate them because the contractor himself might be producing in part for Government and in part for civilian use, and the job of allocating which raw materials went into war contracts and which went into civilian goods was such a problem that they did not at that time want to undertake it. In this bill we have not gone as far as we did in the World War II law with respect to the exemption of such products. Under this bill, the man who produces on the farm, produces from the mine, or produces oil or gas would, in general, be exempt from renegotiation up to the first commercially marketable state. In the World War II act, however, the exemption applied to anyone who sold these raw products whether he produced them or not. We have limited it now to the producer; so it is a little more restrictive in that sense. We do not permit our definition of a raw product to go as high up the scale toward the finished product as was the case in the World War II act. This is of great importance, in my opinion, for in the case of the World War II act we found that we had exempted specifically pig iron used in the manufacture of steel, but that, of course, is not what we had intended to do. I think perhaps those applying the Renegotiation Act went further in their interpretation of the language than we ever intended when we wrote the law itself.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS. Does not the gentleman think that he and all of us would be safe in saying that the committee has profited by all of the mistakes that were made before and that this bill is an honest effort to cure all of them and to make this program more profitable to the Government and more easily administered?

Mr. MILLS. I think the gentleman from Ohio has reflected the viewpoint of every man on the committee. There are certain provisions that I may disagree with or that someone else may disagree with, but on the whole the bill is greatly improved from all viewpoints and in all respects over the law which we thought was reasonably satisfactory in World War II.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I just want to call attention to the fact that, in my opinion, this is a much better measure than was in existence during the World War II period, and one of the most important changes is the change just mentioned by the gentleman from Arkansas wherein he called attention to the restriction on the exemptions. We felt that the exemptions went a little bit too far under the World War II act. That improvement and the improvement in the board are the two main things which the membership should be interested in.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman agrees, then, that this bill should be passed by the House in its present form?

Mr. EBERHARTER. It is mandatory that the House pass it promptly.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIMPSON] has raised a point that concerns a lot of people; that is, whether or not this legislation should refer to and include all types of Government contracts with the seven agencies mentioned in the bill or whether it should be limited to defense contracts. Let me talk just a moment on that, since the gentleman from Pennsylvania has informed me that he will not offer an amendment to prescribe such a limitation.

In the first place, I do not know, and I doubt that any Member is in a position now to properly describe what is and what is not a defense contract. We say contracts with defense establishments, the Army, Navy, Air Force, Atomic Energy Commission, the Department of Commerce, which is the Maritime Administration—that is what we are getting at in that Department—and with General Services Administration which does do some buying of raw materials and other things that go directly into the war effort, as I understand it. We specify certain departments of Government that deal almost exclusively in defense contracts. But if we would say in this bill that there shall be no renegotiation of any contract except a defense contract, then it is necessary, as I take it, for us to define what we mean by a defense contract. What would be a defense contract? I will ask any of you gentlemen who have worked with this a lot longer than I have on the Ways and Means Committee and the Appropriations Committee where you are making appropriations for the defense, What is a defense contract?

If we thus limit the application of the bill to a defense contract without defining what we mean by "defense," have we actually accomplished anything, because the definition, unless we define it, will be left to this renegotiation board? I am glad the gentleman from Pennsylvania is agreeable to passage of the bill by the House in its present form applying to all contracts entered into by these specifically named departments in order to avoid any possibility of ambiguity as to what we intend or mean, and especially in view of the fact we have never defined, or we have never limited renegotiation in the past to strictly defense contracts or to war contracts. Heretofore we have always said that contracts with certain departments would be subject to renegotiation.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. If I read this bill correctly, it really gives the Board established under the provisions of this bill two different authorities: One is to renegotiate contracts; the other duty or responsibility or right or privilege, which may be more important in the finality, is the grant of authority to the Board contained on page 17 to decide what contractors shall come under the provisions of this act and what provisions shall not. Is that not correct?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman from Ohio will remember that there was some discretionary power to exempt contracts and types of contracts in the old law. This time the only additional discretionary authority we have given is in regard to contracts of a secret nature, involving the security of the country.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I can remember a great many war contracts made in the last war that perhaps it would have been better for some people if they had been kept secret, and I am just a little fearful of this secret contract arrangement.

Mr. MILLS. What is contemplated is a contract that involves atomic energy or the sale of uranium, or some such contract of that sort where information cannot be made public in regard to the contract. The gentleman from Ohio understands the situation.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I understand the theory behind it, but here is a Presidential board, named by the President, responsible to the President, which in one sense of the word, at least, will be the strong right arm and the representative of the President, given rather complete powers to decide regarding what agencies should be covered, giving the people discretion and authority to decide whether any or all or a portion of the contractors or contracts shall be exempt from the provisions of the bill. It is rather broad power.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman is right. There is a tremendous grant of power involved in this, and authority and power that could be greatly misused. Heretofore it was possible for the President, during World War II, to call into this particular activity some of the very outstanding, most honorable men in the United States. They came into Government service and devoted their time unselfishly to the job. They did a very admirable job. There has been no criticism of them by anyone. Everyone seems to be satisfied both from the viewpoint of the public, the Government, and the individual contractor. Now in this bill, we say that the President shall appoint five members by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. This is a new board, of course.

Mr. MILLS. Heretofore the Department could select generals or colonels or anyone they wanted to and assign them to renegotiation. But, I must say to the gentleman from Ohio I regret that the salary has been fixed at $12,500; maybe it should have been $14,000 or $15,000, but I really feel, and sincerely believe, that it will be possible for the President to obtain the services of such outstanding men for this job as was the case before; that the Senate will see fit to agree to their appointment, and when they enter Government service they will do the kind of a job that the gentleman wants done and I want done. Certainly we do not want, and it is not intended, that any individual contractor will be exempt from the provisions of this bill just simply because somebody looks with favor upon him.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I think the gentleman will agree, though, that when the Congress of the United States delegates authority and grants such broad and far-reaching powers to any board or any group of men that we should be very careful to surround such a grant of power with every possible safeguard. And I want to call the attention of the gentleman to this particular provision which I am fearful is quite dangerous.

Mr. MILLS. It could be if not properly administered, I must agree with the gentleman from Ohio, but he and I will be watching, as we generally do, the administration of laws which are passed by the Congress. When we find some evidence of misuse or abuse or maladministration of this law, I can assure the gentleman our committee will be most anxious to enact necessary legislation to prevent a repetition of that.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. May I say to the gentleman and to the House as I said to the Committee on Rules yesterday when we had the representatives of the gentleman's committee before us on this particular bill that at the present moment there is no provision, no overall committee, no group representing the House of Representatives—and this is where the people of America sit to legislate—to keep track of that which is going on in this great national emergency, in this great spending effort where we are going to spend, as the President says, $100,000,000,000 a year of the people's money on national defense. Somehow or other, sometime or other, this House should provide some agency of its own to know whether the laws that it passes are carried out properly and whether the money that it appropriates is expended efficiently and well.

Mr. MILLS. Let me assure my friend from Ohio that, pending the passage of such a resolution by the House establishing such a committee, he may rely upon the statement I am about to make, that the Committee on Ways and Means will be very diligent in following the administration of the Renegotiation Act, just as we have attempted in the past to be diligent in following the administration of our internal revenue laws. Our committee is usually busy, but we always find time to assist by making suggestions in regard to proper administration of the laws coming from our committee.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRIS. I notice that in the exemption provision is included the phrase, "Any contract or subcontract for an agricultural commodity in its raw or natural state."

Mr. MILLS. That is right.

Mr. HARRIS. Is it not true, however, that this legislation would cover any sale of cotton to textile mills?

Mr. MILLS. Any cotton sold by a farmer direct which might be part of a subcontract to an original contract with one of the specified Departments would not be included within the jurisdiction of the bill. However, if my friend from Arkansas should accumulate from farmers over his area 1,000 bales of cotton or enough cotton to equal $100,000 or more——

Mr. HARRIS. Which is unlikely.

Mr. MILLS. Of course, I do not want to give the wrong impression of my friend. I know he would not accumulate that much. My friend, in such case, who had not raised the cotton but had accumulated the cotton as a broker accumulates cotton, would not be exempt from the provisions of this bill. His contract with some cotton mill that dealt with one of the specified departments might be subjected to renegotiation. Under the old law, such a contract was not subjected to renegotiation.

Mr. HARRIS. The producers of cotton in many instances do their first processing, that is, by ginning. If a producer does his own ginning, then would he be subject to renegotiation?

Mr. MILLS. Receipts or accruals from the sale of cotton in bale form in the amount of $100,000 or less by the producer would not be subjected to renegotiation under the terms of this bill. Cotton in the bale is the form in which we are talking about as being an agricultural commodity exempt from renegotiation.

Mr. HARRIS. I mean $100,000 or more would not be exempted?

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman understands there is a provision in the bill which exempts from renegotiation a contractor who has receipts or accruals of $100,000 or less during a fiscal year from otherwise renegotiable contracts.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. When it becomes necessary to provide facilities to train those men who are called into service, would the contract that might be entered into then be a war contract?

Mr. MILLS. Yes, I presume it might. I do not know what example the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Building barracks, for instance. Suppose a contractor is called on to erect barracks on the ground, and it amounts to more than $100,000. Is that a war contract?

Mr. MILLS. Certainly, I would consider that a defense or war contract, yes. But the gentleman wants to bear in mind we are not thinking in terms of procurement here as to the purpose of a particular contract. We are thinking in terms of the renegotiation of contracts with these seven specified agencies of Government where it appears such a price has been charged for the execution of the contract that the contractor, if not renegotiated, will be left with what are termed excessive profits. The gentleman remembers as a result of the law in World War II, which I am sure the gentleman supported, there were some $200,000,000,000 subject to renegotiation and that the Government recaptured through renegotiations approximately $11,000,000,000. A large part of this sum would never have been recaptured by an excess-profits tax.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes, but what I had in mind was this. During the last war when we were building cantonments near here in two places those who were building them, the working men, were required to take out weekly permits for $2.50 a week to be deducted from their pay so that they might be able to work on those projects.

Mr. MILLS. I know what the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes, I thought you would.

Mr. MILLS. Our committee deferred action on that subject because we knew of the gentleman's intense interest in it, and we knew of his great knowledge on the subject. We wanted to leave that to him.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. To whom?

Mr. MILLS. To you. We wanted to leave that subject to you.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. If you left it to me I would fix it.

Mr. MILLS. And we knew the gentleman would fix it and do a better job than the Committee on Ways and Means could do.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I would stop that kind of practice.

Mr. MILLS. We did not legislate on that subject.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I would like to know why that was not like an excess profits tax.

Mr. MILLS. I tried to explain to the gentleman that we wanted to leave that subject to the gentleman from Michigan who knows more about it than we do.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I do not see why the gentleman is being facetious about a serious matter.

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no further requests for time, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Renegotiation Act of 1951."

TITLE I—RENEGOTIATION OF CONTRACTS

SEC. 101. Declaration of policy.

It is hereby recognized and declared that the Congress has made available for the execution of the national defense program extensive funds, by appropriation and otherwise, for the procurement of property, processes, and services, and the construction of facilities necessary for the national defense; that sound execution of the national defense program requires the elimination of excessive profits from contracts made with the United States, and from related subcontracts, in the course of said program; and that the considered policy of the Congress, in the interests of the national defense and the general welfare of the Nation, requires that such excessive profits be eliminated as provided in this title.

SEC. 102. Contracts subject to renegotiation.

(a) In general: The provisions of this title shall be applicable (1) to all contracts with the Departments specifically named in section 103 (a), and related subcontracts, to the extent of the amounts received or accrued by a contractor or subcontractor on or after the first day of January 1951, whether such contracts or subcontracts were made on, before, or after such first day, and (2) to all contracts with the Departments designated by the President under section 103 (a), and related subcontracts, to the extent of the amounts received or accrued by a contractor or subcontractor on or after the first day of the first month beginning after the date of such designation, whether such contracts or subcontracts were made on, before, or after such first day; but the provisions of this title shall not be applicable to receipts or accruals attributable to performance, under contracts or subcontracts, after December 31, 1953.

(b) Renegotiation Act of 1948: The Renegotiation Act of 1948 shall not apply with respect to any receipts or accruals subject to renegotiation under this title. If a contractor or subcontractor, during the same fiscal year in which he has receipts or accruals subject to renegotiation under this title, has other receipts or accruals from contracts or subcontracts subject to renegotiation under the Renegotiation Act of 1948, the provisions of this title shall, notwithstanding subsection (a), apply to such other receipts or accruals if the Board and such contractor or subcontractor agree to such application of this title; and in the case of such an agreement the provisions of the Renegotiation Act of 1948 shall not apply to such other receipts or accruals of the fiscal year.

(c) Suspension of certain profit limitations: Notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, the profit-limitation provisions of the act of March 27, 1934 (48 Stat. 503, 505), as amended and supplemented, shall not apply to any contract or subcontract if any of the receipts or accruals therefrom are subject to this title.

SEC. 103. Definitions.

For the purposes of this title—

(a) Department: The term "Department" means the Department of Defense, the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, the Department of the Air Force, the Department of Commerce, the General Services Administration, the Atomic Energy Commission, and such other agencies of the Government exercising functions in connection with the national defense as the President shall designate.

(b) Secretary: The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of the Army, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Air Force, the Secretary of Commerce, the Administrator of General Services, the Atomic Energy Commission, and the head of any other agency of the Government which the President shall designate pursuant to subsection (a) of this section.

(c) Board: The term "Board" means the Renegotiation Board created by section 107 (a) of this act.

(d) Renegotiate and renegotiation: The terms "renegotiate" and "renegotiation" include a determination by agreement or order under this title of the amount of any excessive profits.

(e) Excessive profits: The term "excessive profits" means the portion of the profits derived from contracts with the Departments and subcontracts which is determined in accordance with this title to be excessive. In determining excessive profits there shall be taken into consideration the following factors:

(1) Efficiency of contractor, with particular regard to attainment of quantity and quality production, reduction of costs, and economy in the use of materials, facilities, and manpower;

(2) Reasonableness of costs and profits, with particular regard to volume of production, normal earnings, and comparison of war and peacetime products;

(3) Reasonableness of return on net worth, with particular regard to the amount and source of public and private capital employed;

(4) Extent of risk assumed, including the risk incident to reasonable pricing policies;

(5) Nature and extent of contribution to the defense effort, including inventive and developmental contribution and cooperation with the Government and other contractors in supplying technical assistance;

(6) Character of business, including source and nature of materials, complexity of manufacturing technique, character and extent of subcontracting, and rate of turn-over;

(7) Such other factors the consideration of which the public interest and fair and equitable dealing may require, which factors shall be published in the regulations of the Board from time to time as adopted.

(f) Profits derived from contracts with the Departments and subcontracts: The term "profits derived from contracts with the Departments and subcontracts" means the excess of the amount received or accrued under such contracts and subcontracts over the costs paid or incurred with respect thereto and determined to be allocable thereto. All items estimated to be allowable as deductions and exclusions under chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code (excluding taxes measured by income) shall, to the extent allocable to such contracts and subcontracts, be allowed as items of cost, except that no amount shall be allowed as an item of cost by reason of the application of a carry-over or carry-back. Such costs shall be determined in accordance with the method of cost accounting regularly employed by the contractor or subcontractor in keeping his books, but if no such method of cost accounting has been employed, or if the method so employed does not, in the opinion of the Board, or, upon redetermination, in the opinion of the Tax Court of the United States, properly reflect such costs, such costs shall be determined in accordance with such method as in the opinion of the Board, or, upon redetermination, in the opinion of the Tax Court of the United States, does properly reflect such costs. Irrespective of the method employed or prescribed for determining such costs, no item of cost shall be charged to contracts with the Departments or subcontracts or used in any manner for the purpose of determining such costs, to the extent that, in the opinion of the Board, or, upon redetermination, in the opinion of the Tax Court of the United States, such item is unreasonable or not properly chargeable to such contracts or subcontracts. In determining the amount of excessive profits to be eliminated proper adjustment shall be made on account of the taxes measured by income, other than Federal taxes, which are attributable to the portion of the profits which are not excessive.

(g) Subcontract: The term "subcontract" means—

(1) any purchase order or agreement (including purchase orders or agreements antedating the related prime contract or higher tier subcontract) to perform all or any part of the work, or to make or furnish any materials, required for the performance of any other contract or subcontract;

(2) any contract or arrangement covering the right to use any patented or secret method, formula, or device for the performance of a contract or subcontract; and

(3) any contract or arrangement (other than a contract or arrangement between two contracting parties, one of whom is found by the Board to be a bona fide executive officer, partner, or full-time employee of the other contracting party) under which—

(A) any amount payable is contingent upon the procurement of a contract or contracts with a Department or of a subcontract or subcontracts; or

(B) any amount payable is determined with reference to the amount of a contract or contracts with a Department or of a subcontract or subcontracts; or

(C) any part of the services performed or to be performed consists of the soliciting, attempting to procure, or procuring a contract or contracts with a Department or a subcontract or subcontracts.

Nothing in this subsection shall be construed (i) to affect in any way the validity or construction of provisions in any contract with a Department or any subcontract, heretofore at any time or hereafter made, prohibiting the payment of contingent fees or commissions; or (ii) to restrict in any way the authority of the Board to determine the nature or amount of selling expense under subcontracts as defined in this subsection, as a proper element of the contract price or as a reimbursable item of cost, under a contract with a Department or a subcontract.

(h) Fiscal year: The term "fiscal year" means, except in the case of a partnership as defined in section 3797 (a) (2) of the Internal Revenue Code, the taxable year of the contractor or subcontractor under chapter 1 of such code. In the case of a partnership as so defined the term "fiscal year" means such period as the Board by regulations may prescribe.

(i) Received or accrued and paid or incurred: The terms "received or accrued" and "paid or incurred" shall be construed according to the method of accounting employed by the contractor or subcontractor in keeping his books, but if no such method of accounting has been employed, or if the method so employed does not, in the opinion of the Board, or, upon redetermination, in the opinion of the Tax Court of the United States, properly reflect his receipts or accruals or payments or obligations, such receipts or accruals or such payments or obligations shall be determined in accordance with such method as in the opinion of the Board, or, upon redetermination in the opinion of the Tax Court of the United States, does properly reflect such receipts or accruals or such payments or obligations.

(j) Person: The term "person" shall include an individual, firm, corporation, association, partnership, and any organized group of persons whether or not incorporated.

(k) Materials: The term "materials" shall include raw materials, articles, commodities, parts, assemblies, products, machinery, equipment, supplies, components, technical data, processes, and other personal property.

(l) Agency of the Government: The term "agency of the Government" means any part of the executive branch of the Government or any independent establishment of the Government or part thereof, including any Department (whether or not a Department as defined in subsection (a) of this section), any corporation wholly or partly owned by the United States which is an instrumentality of the United States, or any board, bureau, division, service, office, officer, employee, authority, administration, or other establishment of the Government which is not a part of the legislative or judicial branches.

SEC. 104. Renegotiation clause in contracts.

Subject to section 106 (a), the Secretary of each Department specifically named in section 103 (a) shall insert in each contract made by such Department 30 days or more after the date of the enactment of this act, and the Secretary of each department designated by the President under section 103 (a) shall insert in each contract made by such Department 30 days or more after the date of such designation, a provision under which the contractor agrees—

(1) to the elimination of excessive profits through renegotiation;

(2) that there may be withheld by the United States from amounts otherwise due the contractor, or that he will repay to the United States, if paid to him, any excessive profits;

(3) that he will insert in each subcontract described in section 103 (g) a provision under which the subcontractor agrees—

(A) to the elimination of excessive profits through renegotiation;

(B) that there may be withheld by the contractor for the United States from amounts otherwise due to the subcontractor, or that the subcontractor will repay to the United States, if paid to him, any excessive profits;

(C) that the contractor shall be relieved of all liability to the subcontractor on account of any amount so withheld, or so repaid by the subcontractor to the United States;

(D) that he will insert in each subcontract described in section 103 (g) provisions corresponding to those of subparagraphs (A), (B), and (C), and to those of this subparagraph;

(4) that there may be withheld by the United States from amounts otherwise due the contractor, or that he will repay to the United States, as the Secretary may direct, any amounts which under section 105 (b) (1) (C) the contractor is directed to withhold from a subcontractor and which are actually unpaid at the time the contractor receives such direction.

The obligations assumed by the contractor or subcontractor under paragraph (1) or (3) (A), as the case may be, agreeing to the elimination of excessive profits through renegotiation shall be binding on him only if the contract or subcontract, as the case may be, is subject to this title. A provision inserted in a contract or subcontract, which recites in substance that the contract or subcontract shall be deemed to contain all the provisions required by this section shall be sufficient compliance with this section. Whether or not the provisions specified in this section are inserted in a contract with a department or subcontract, to which this title is applicable, such contract or subcontract, as the case may be, shall be considered as having been made subject to this title in the same manner and to the same extent as if such provisions had been inserted.

SEC. 105. Renegotiation proceedings.

(a) Proceedings before the Board: Renegotiation proceedings shall be commenced by the mailing of notice to that effect, in such form as may be prescribed by regulation, by registered mail to the contractor or subcontractor. The Board shall endeavor to make an agreement with the contractor or subcontractor with respect to the elimination of excessive profits received or accrued, and with respect to such other matters relating thereto as the Board deems advisable. Any such agreement, if made, may, with the consent of the contractor or subcontractor, also include provisions with respect to the elimination of excessive profits likely to be received or accrued. If the Board does not make an agreement with respect to the elimination of excessive profits received or accrued, it shall issue and enter an order determining the amount, if any, of such excessive profits, and forthwith give notice thereof by registered mail to the contractor or subcontractor. In the absence of the filing of a petition with the Tax Court of the United States under the provisions of and within the time limit prescribed in section 108, such order shall be final and conclusive and shall not be subject to review or redetermination by any court or other agency. The Board shall exercise its powers with respect to the aggregate of the amounts received or accrued during the fiscal year (or such other period as may be fixed by mutual agreement) by a contractor or subcontractor under contracts with the departments and subcontracts, and not separately with respect to amounts received or accrued under separate contracts with the deparments or subcontracts, except that the Board may exercise such powers separately with respect to amounts received or accrued by the contractor or subcontractor under any one or more separate contracts with the departments or subcontracts at the request of the contractor or subcontractor. By agreement with any contractor or subcontractor, and pursuant to regulations promulgated by it, the Board may in its discretion conduct renegotiation on a consolidated basis in order properly to reflect excessive profits of two or more related contractors or subcontractors. Whenever the Board makes a determination with respect to the amount of excessive profits, and such determination is made by order, it shall, at the request of the contractor or subcontractor, as the case may be, prepare and furnish such contractor or subcontractor with a statement of such determination, of the facts used as a basis therefor, and of its reasons for such determination. Such statement shall not be used in the Tax Court of the United States as proof of the facts or conclusions stated therein.

(b) Methods of eliminating excessive profits:

(1) In general: Upon the making of an agreement, or the entry of an order, under subsection (a) of this section by the Board, or the entry of an order under section 108 by the Tax Court of the United States, determining excessive profits, the Board shall forthwith authorize and direct the Secretaries or any of them to eliminate such excessive profits—

(A) by reductions in the amounts otherwise payable to the contractor under contracts with the departments, or by other revision of their terms;

(B) by withholding from amounts otherwise due to the contractor any amount of such excessive profits;

(C) by directing any person having a contract with any agency of the Government, or any subcontractor thereunder, to withhold for the account of the United States from any amounts otherwise due from such person or such subcontractor to a contractor, or subcontractor, having excessive profits to be eliminated, and every such person or subcontractor receiving such direction shall withhold and pay over to the United States the amounts so required to be withheld;

(D) by recovery from the contractor or subcontractor, or from any person or subcontractor directed under subparagraph (C) to withhold for the account of the United States, through payment, repayment, credit, or suit any amount of such excessive profits realized by the contractor or subcontractor or directed under subparagraph (C) to be withheld for the account of the United States; or

(E) by any combination of these methods, as is deemed desirable.

(2) Interest: Interest at the rate of 6 percent per annum shall accrue and be paid on the amount of such excessive profits from the date fixed for repayment by the order of the Board or by the agreement with the contractor or subcontractor to the date of repayment, and on amounts required to be withheld by any person or subcontractor for the account of the United States pursuant to paragraph (1) (C), from the date payment is demanded by the Secretaries or any of them to the date of payment. When the Tax Court of the United States, under section 108, redetermines the amount of excessive profits received or accrued by a contractor or subcontractor, interest at the rate of 6 percent per annum shall accrue and be paid by such contractor or subcontractor as follows:

(A) When the amount of excessive profits determined by the Tax Court is greater than the amount determined by the Board, interest shall accrue and be paid on the amount determined by the Board from the date originally fixed by the Board for its repayment to the date of repayment and, in addition thereto, interest shall accrue and be paid on the additional amount determined by the Tax Court from the date of its order determining such excessive profits to the date of repayment.

(B) When the amount of excessive profits determined by the Tax Court is equal to the amount determined by the Board, interest shall accrue and be paid on such amount from the date originally fixed by the Board for its repayment to the date of repayment.

(C) When the amount of excessive profits determined by the Tax Court is less than the amount determined by the Board, interest shall accrue and be paid on such lesser amount from the date originally fixed for repayment by the Board to the date of repayment.

(3) Suits for recovery: Actions on behalf of the United States may be brought in the appropriate courts of the United States to recover, (A) from the contractor or subcontractor, any amount of such excessive profits and accrued interest not withheld or eliminated by some other method under this subsection, and (B) from any person or subcontractor who has been directed under paragraph (1) (C) of this subsection to withhold for the account of the United States, the amounts required to be withheld under such paragraph, together with accrued interest thereon.

(4) Sureties: The surety under a contract or subcontract shall not be liable for the repayment of any excessive profits thereon.

(5) Indemnification: Each person is hereby indemnified by the United States against all claims on account of amounts withheld by such person pursuant to this subsection from a contractor or subcontractor and paid over to the United States.

(6) Treatment of recoveries: All money recovered in respect to amounts paid to a contractor from appropriations from the Treasury by way of repayment or suit under this subsection shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. Upon the withholding of any amount of excessive profits or the crediting of any amount of excessive profits against amounts otherwise due a contractor, the Secretary shall certify the amount thereof to the Treasury and the appropriations of his Department shall be reduced by an amount equal to the amount so withheld or credited. The amount of such reductions shall be transferred to the surplus fund of the Treasury. All money recovered in respect of amounts paid to the contractor from corporate or other revolving funds (other than appropriations from the Treasury) by way of repayment, withholding, crediting, or suit under this section shall be restored to such funds. The Board is authorized to make regulations giving effect to the intent of this provision in respect of money recovered representing subcontract excessive profits not readily identifiable as to the public funds ultimately reflecting charges therefor.

(7) Credit for taxes paid: In eliminating excessive profits, the Secretary shall allow the contractor or subcontractor credit for Federal income and excess-profits taxes as provided in section 3806 of the Internal Revenue Code.

(c) Periods of limitations: No proceeding to determine the amount of excessive profits for any fiscal year shall be commenced more than 1 year after the statement required under subsection (e) (1) of this section is filed with the Board with respect to such year, and, if such proceeding is not commenced prior to the expiration of 1 year following the date upon which such statement is so filed, all liabilities of the contractor or subcontractor for excessive profits received or accrued during such fiscal year shall thereupon be discharged. If an agreement or order determining the amount of excessive profits is not made within 2 years following the commencement of the renegotiation proceeding, then upon the expiration of such 2 years all liabilities of the contractor or subcontractor for excessive profits with respect to which such proceeding was commenced shall thereupon be discharged, except that (1) if an order is made within such 2 years pursuant to a delegation of authority under subsection (d) of section 107, such 2-year limitation shall not apply to review of such order by the Board, and (2) such 2-year period may be extended by mutual agreement.

(d) Agreements to eliminate excessive profits: For the purposes of this title the Board may make final or other agreements with a contractor or subcontractor for the elimination of excessive profits and for the discharge of any liability for excessive profits under this title. Such agreements may contain such terms and conditions as the Board deems advisable. Any such agreement shall be conclusive according to its terms; and, except upon a showing of fraud or malfeasance or a willful misrepresentation of a material fact, (1) such agreement shall not for the purposes of this title be reopened as to the matters agreed upon, and shall not be modified by any officer, employee, or agent of the United States, and (2) such agreement and any determination made in accordance therewith shall not be annulled, modified, set aside, or disregarded in any suit, action, or proceeding. Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, however, the Board shall have the power, pursuant to regulations promulgated by it, to modify any agreement or order for the purpose of extending the time for payment of sums due under such agreement or order.

(e) Information available to Board:

(1) Furnishing of financial statements, etc.: Every person who holds contracts or subcontracts, to which the provisions of this title are applicable, shall, in such form and detail as the Board may by regulations prescribe, file with the Board, on or before the first day of the fourth calendar month following the close of his fiscal year, a financial statement setting forth such information as the Board may by regulations prescribe as necessary to carry out this title. In addition to the statement required under the preceding sentence, every such person shall, at such time or times and in such form and detail as the Board may by regulations prescribe, furnish the Board any information, records, or data which are determined by the Board to be necessary to carry out this title. Any person who willfully fails or refuses to furnish any statement, information, records, or data required of him under this subsection, or who knowingly furnishes any such statement, information, records, or data containing information which is false or misleading in any material respect, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both.

(2) Audit of books and records: For the purpose of this title, the Board shall have the right to audit the books and records of any contractor or subcontractor subject to this title. In the interest of economy and the avoidance of duplication of inspection and audit, the services of the Bureau of Internal Revenue shall, upon request of the Board and the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, be made available to the extent determined by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of making examinations and audits under this title.

(f) Minimum amounts subject to renegotiation:

(1) In general: If the aggregate of the amounts received or accrued during a fiscal year (and on or after the applicable effective date specified in section 102 (a)) by a contractor or subcontractor, and all persons under control of or controlling or under common control with the contractor or subcontractor, under contracts with the Departments and subcontracts described in section 103 (g) (1) and (2), is not more than $100,000, the receipts or accruals from such contracts and subcontracts shall not, for such fiscal year, be renegotiated under this title. If the aggregate of such amounts received or accrued during the fiscal year under such contracts and subcontracts is more than $100,000, no determination of excessive profits to be eliminated for such year with respect to such contracts and subcontracts shall be in an amount greater than the amount by which such aggregate exceeds $100,000.

(2) Subcontracts described in section 103 (g) (3): If the aggregate of the amounts received or accrued during a fiscal year (and on or after the applicable effective date specified in section 102 (a)) by a subcontractor, and all persons under control of or controlling or under common control with the subcontractor, under subcontracts described in section 103 (g) (3) is not more than $25,000, the receipts or accruals from such subcontracts shall not, for such fiscal year, be renegotiated under this title. If the aggregate of such amounts received or accrued during the fiscal year under such subcontracts is more than $25,000, no determination of excessive profits to be eliminated for such year with respect to such subcontracts shall be in an amount greater than the amount by which such aggregate exceeds $25,000.

(3) Computation: In computing the aggregate of the amounts received or accrued during any fiscal year for the purposes of paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subsection, such computation shall be made without elimination of intercompany sales. If the fiscal year is a fractional part of 12 months, the $100,000 amount and the $25,000 amount shall be reduced to the same fractional part thereof for the purposes of paragraphs (1) and (2).

SEC. 106. Exemptions.

(a) Mandatory exemptions: The provisions of this title shall not apply to—

(1) any contract by a department with any Territory, possession, or State, or any agency or political subdivision thereof, or with any foreign government or any agency thereof; or

(2) any contract or subcontract for an agricultural commodity in its raw or natural state, or if the commodity is not customarily sold or has not an established market in its raw or natural state, in the first form or state, beyond the raw or natural state, in which it is customarily sold or in which it has an established market, but only if such contract or subcontract is with the producer of such agricultural commodity. The term "agricultural commodity" as used herein shall include but shall not be limited to—

(A) commodities resulting from the cultivation of the soil such as grains of all kinds, fruits, nuts, vegetables, hay, straw, cotton, tobacco, sugarcane, and sugar beets;

(B) natural resins, saps, and gums of trees;

(C) animals, such as cattle, hogs, poultry, and sheep, fish, and other marine life, and the produce of live animals, such as wool, eggs, milk, and cream; or

(3) any contract or subcontract for the product of a mine, oil or gas well, or other mineral or natural deposit, which has not been processed, refined, or treated beyond the ordinary treatment processes normally applied by producers in order to obtain the first commercially marketable product, but only if such contract or subcontract is with the owner or operator of the mine, well, or deposit from which such product is produced. The term "ordinary treatment processes" means, in the case of the product of a mine, well, or deposit with respect to which an allowance for percentage depletion is provided by section 114 (b) (3) or (4) of the Internal Revenue Code, those processes which are taken into account under such section in computing gross income from the property, and in the case of any other product such term means such similar processes as may be prescribed under regulations promulgated by the Board; or

(4) any contract or subcontract for timber which has not been processed beyond the form of logs, but only if such contract or subcontract is with the owner of the timber property or with the producer of the logs; or

(5) any subcontract directly or indirectly under a contract or subcontract to which this title does not apply by reason of this subsection.

(b) Cost allowance: In the case of a contractor or subcontractor who produces an agricultural product and processes, refines, or treats such a product beyond the first form or state provided in paragraph (2) of subsection (a), or who produces the product of a mine, oil or gas well, or other mineral or natural deposit, or timber, and processes, refines, or treats such a product beyond the first commercially marketable state provided in paragraph (3) of subsection (a) or, in the case of timber, beyond the form of logs, the Board shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to give the contractor or subcontractor a cost allowance substantially equivalent to the amount which would have been realized by such contractor or subcontractor if he had sold the product in the form or state provided in paragraph (2) or (3) of subsection (a), or, in the case of timber, in the form of logs.

(c) Permissive exemptions: The Board is authorized, in its discretion, to exempt from some or all of the provisions of this title—

(1) any contract or subcontract to be performed outside of the territorial limits of the continental United States or in Alaska;

(2) any contracts or subcontracts under which, in the opinion of the Board, the profits can be determined with reasonable certainty when the contract price is established, such as certain classes of (A) agreements for personal services or for the purchase of real property, perishable goods, or commodities the minimum price for the sale of which has been fixed by a public regulatory body, (B) leases and license agreements, and (C) agreements where the period of performance under such contract or subcontract will not be in excess of 30 days;

(3) any contract or subcontract or performance thereunder during a specified period or periods if, in the opinion of the Board, the provisions of the contract are otherwise adequate to prevent excessive profits;

(4) any contract or subcontract the renegotiation of which would jeopardize secrecy required in the public interest;

(5) any subcontract or group of subcontracts not otherwise exempt from the provisions of this section if, in the opinion of the Board, it is not administratively feasible in the case of such subcontract or in the case of such group of subcontracts to determine and segregate the profits attributable to such subcontract or group of subcontracts from the profits attributable to activities not subject to renegotiation.

The Board may so exempt contracts and subcontracts both individually and by general classes or types.

SEC. 107. Renegotiation Board.

(a) Creation of Board: There is hereby created, as an independent establishment in the executive branch of the Government, a Renegotiation Board to be composed of five members appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Not less than three members of the Board shall be appointed from civilian life. The President shall designate one member to serve as chairman of the Board. Each member shall receive compensation at the rate of $12,500 per annum. No member shall engage in any business, vocation, or employment other than that as a member of the Board. The Board shall have a seal which shall be judicially recognized.

(b) Places of meetings and quorum: The principal office of the Board shall be at such place as may be determined from time to time by the Board, but it or any division thereof may meet and exercise its powers at any other place. The Board may establish such number of offices as it deems necessary to expedite the work of the Board. Three members of the Board shall constitute a quorum, and any power, function, or duty of the Board may be exercised or performed by a majority of the members present if the members present constitute at least a quorum.

(c) Personnel: The Board is authorized, subject to the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1949, to employ and fix the compensation of such officers and employees as it deems necessary to assist it in carrying out its duties under this title. The Board may, with the consent of the head of the agency of the Government concerned, utilize the services of any officers or employees of the United States, and reimburse such agency for the services so utilized. Officers or employees whose services are so utilized shall not receive additional compensation for such services, but shall be allowed and paid necessary travel expenses and a per diem in lieu of subsistence in accordance with the Standardized Government Travel Regulations while away from their homes or official station on duties of the Board.

(d) Delegation of powers: The Board may delegate in whole or in part any function, power, or duty (other than its power to promulgate regulations and rules) to any agency of the Government, including any such agency established by the Board, and may authorize the successive redelegation, within limits specified by it, of any such function, power, or duty to any agency of the Government, including any such agency established by the Board.

(e) Organization and operation of Board: The Chairman of the Board may from time to time divide the Board into divisions of one or more members, assign the members of the Board thereto, and in case of a division of more than one member, designate the chief thereof. The Board may also, by regulations or otherwise, determine the character of cases to be conducted initially by the Board through an officer or officers of, or utilized by, the Board, the character of cases to be conducted initially by the various agencies of the Government authorized to exercise powers of the Board pursuant to subsection (d) of this section, the character of cases to be conducted initially by the various divisions of the Board, and the character of cases to be conducted initially by the Board itself. The Board may review any determination in any case not initially conducted by it, on its own motion or, in its discretion, at the request of any contractor or subcontractor aggrieved thereby. Unless the Board upon its own motion initiates a review of such determination within 90 days from the date of such determination, or at the request of the contractor or subcontractor made within 90 days from the date of such determination initiates a review of such determination within 90 days from the date of such request, such determination shall be deemed the determination of the Board. If such determination was made by an order with respect to which notice thereof was given by registered mail pursuant to section 105 (a), the Board shall give notice by registered mail to the contractor or subcontractor of its decision not to review the case. If the Board reviews any determination in any case not initially conducted by it, it shall issue and enter an order under section 105 (a) determining the amount, if any, of excessive profits, and forthwith give notice thereof by registered mail to the contractor or subcontractor. The amount of excessive profits so determined upon review may be less than, equal to, or greater than, that determined by the agency of the Government whose action is so reviewed.

(f) Delegation of renegotiation functions to Board: The Board is hereby authorized and directed to accept and perform such renegotiation powers, duties, and functions as may be delegated to it under any other law requiring or permitting renegotiation, and the Board is further authorized to redelegate any such power, duty, or function to any agency of the Government and to authorize successive redelegations thereof, within limits specified by the Board. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of Defense is hereby authorized to delegate to the Board, in whole or in part, the powers, functions, and duties conferred upon him by any other renegotiation law.

SEC. 108. Review by the Tax Court.

Any contractor or subcontractor aggrieved by an order of the Board determining the amount of excessive profits received or accrued by such contractor or subcontractor may—

(a) if the case was conducted initially by the Board itself—within 90 days (not counting Sunday or a legal holiday in the District of Columbia as the last day) after the mailing under section 105 (a) of the notice of such order, or

(b) if the case was not conducted initially by the Board itself—within 90 days (not counting Sunday or a legal holiday in the District of Columbia as the last day) after the mailing under section 107 (e) of the notice of the decision of the Board not to review the case or the notice of the order of the Board determining the amount of excessive profits, file a petition with the Tax Court of the United States for a redetermination thereof. Upon such filing such court shall have exclusive jurisdiction, by order, to finally determine the amount, if any, of such excessive profits received or accrued by the contractor or subcontractor, and such determination shall not be reviewed or redetermined by any court or agency. The court may determine as the amount of excessive profits an amount either less than, equal to, or greater than that determined by the Board. A proceeding before the Tax Court to finally determine the amount, if any, of excessive profits shall not be treated as a proceeding to review the determination of the Board, but shall be treated as a proceeding de novo. For the purposes of this section the court shall have the same powers and duties, insofar as applicable in respect of the contractor, the subcontractor, the Board, and the Secretary, and in respect of the attendance of witnesses and the production of papers, notice of hearings, hearings before divisions, review by the Tax Court of decisions of divisions, stenographic reporting, and reports of proceedings, as such court has under sections 1110, 1111, 1113, 1114, 1115 (a), 1116, 1117 (a), 1118, 1120, and 1121 of the Internal Revenue Code in the case of a proceeding to redetermine a deficiency. In the case of any witness for the Board, the fees and mileage, and the expenses of taking any deposition shall be paid out of appropriations of the Board available for that purpose, and in the case of any other witnesses shall be paid, subject to rules prescribed by the court, by the party at whose instance the witness appears or the deposition is taken. The filing of a petition under this section shall not operate to stay the execution of the order of the Board under subsection (b) of section 105. Any amount collected by the United States under an order of the Board in excess of the amount found to be due under a determination of excessive profits by the Tax Court shall be refunded to the contractor or subcontractor with interest thereon at the rate of 6 percent per annum from the date of collection by the United States to the date of refund.

SEC. 109. Rules and regulations.

The Board may make such rules, regulations, and orders as it deems necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of this title.

SEC. 110. Compliance with regulations, etc.

No person shall be held liable for damages or penalties for any act or failure to act resulting directly or indirectly from his compliance with a rule, regulation, or order issued pursuant to this title, notwithstanding that any such rule, regulation, or order shall thereafter be declared by judicial or other competent authority to be invalid.

SEC 111. Application of Administrative Procedure Act.

The functions exercised under this title shall be excluded from the operation of the Administrative Procedure Act (60 Stat. 237) except as to the requirements of section 3 thereof.

SEC. 112. Appropriations.

There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary and appropriate for the carrying out of the provisions and purposes of this title. Funds made available for the purposes of this title may be allocated or transferred for any of the purposes of this title, with the approval of the Bureau of the Budget to any agency of the Government designated to assist in carrying out this title. Funds so allocated or transferred shall remain available for such period as may be specified in the acts making such funds available.

SEC. 113. Prosecution of claims against United States by former personnel.

Nothing in title 18, United States Code, sections 281 and 283, or in section 190 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 5, sec. 99) shall be deemed to prevent any person by reason of service prior to January 1, 1954, in performance of duties or functions required by this act, from acting as counsel, agent, or attorney for prosecuting any claim against the United States: Provided, That such person shall not prosecute any claim against the United States (1) involving any subject matter directly connected with which such person was so employed, or (2) during the period such person is engaged in employment in a department or the Board.

TITLE II—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 201. Functions under World War II Renegotiation Act.

(a) Abolition of War Contracts Price Adjustment Board: The War Contracts Price Adjustment Board, created by the Renegotiation Act, is hereby abolished.

(b) Transfer of functions in general: All powers, functions, and duties conferred upon the War Contracts Price Adjustment Board by the Renegotiation Act and not otherwise specifically dealt with in this section are transferred to the Renegotiation Board.

(c) Amendment of the Renegotiation Act: Subsection (a) (4) (D) of the Renegotiation Act is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following: "A net renegotiation rebate shall not be repaid unless a claim therefor has been filed with the Board on or before the date of its abolition, or unless a claim shall have been filed with the Administrator of General Services (i) on or before June 30, 1951, or (ii) within 90 days after the making of an agreement or the entry of an order under subsection (c) (1) determining the amount of excessive profits, whichever is later. A claim shall be deemed to have been filed when received by the Board or the Administrator, whether or not accompanied by a statement of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue showing the amortization deduction allowed for the renegotiated year upon the recomputation made pursuant to section 124 (d) of the Internal Revenue Code."

(d) Transfer of certain functions: All powers, functions, and duties conferred upon the War Contracts Price Adjustment Board by subsection (a) (4) (D) of the Renegotiation Act, subject to the amendment thereof by subsection (c) of this section, are hereby transferred to the Administrator of General Services.

(e) Functions and records: Each Secretary of a Department is authorized and directed to eliminate the excessive profits determined under all existing renegotiation agreements or orders by the methods enumerated in subsection (c) (2) of the Renegotiation Act in respect of all renegotiations conducted by his Department pursuant to delegations from the War Contracts Price Adjustment Board. The several Departments shall retain custody of the renegotiation case files covering renegotiations thus conducted for such time as the Secretary deems necessary for the purposes of this section, and thereafter they shall be made available to the Renegotiation Board for appropriate disposition. The renegotiation records of the War Contracts Price Adjustment Board shall become records of the Renegotiation Board on the effective date of this section.

(f) Refunds: All refunds under subsection (a) (4) (D) of the Renegotiation Act (relating to the recomputation of the amortization deduction), all refunds under the last sentense of subsection (1) (3) of such act (relating to excess inventories), and all amounts finally adjudged or determined to have been erroneously collected by the United States pursuant to a determination of excessive profits, with interest thereon in the last mentioned case at a rate not to exceed 4 percent per annum as may be determined by the Administrator of General Services or his duly authorized representative computed to the date of certification to the Treasury Department for payment, shall be certified by the Administrator of General Services or his duly authorized representative to the Treasury Department for payment from such appropriations as may be available therefor: Provided, That such refunds shall be based solely on the certificate of the Administrator of General Services or his duly authorized representative.

(g) Existing policies, procedures, etc., to remain in effect: All policies, procedures, directives, and delegations of authority prescribed or issued (1) by the War Contracts Price Adjustment Board, or (2) by any Secretary or other duly authorized officer of the Government, under the authority of the Renegotiation Act, in effect upon the effective date of this section and not inconsistent herewith, shall remain in full force and effect unless and until superseded, or except as they may be amended, under the authority of this section or any other appropriate authority. All functions, powers, and responsibilities transferred by this section shall be accompanied by the authority to issue appropriate regulations and procedures, or to modify existing procedures, in respect of such powers, functions, and responsibilities.

(h) Savings provision: This section shall not be construed (1) to prohibit disbursements authorized by the War Contracts Price Adjustment Board and certified pursuant to its authority prior to the effective date of this section, (2) to affect the validity or finality of any agreement or order made or issued pursuant to law by the War Contracts Price Adjustment Board or pursuant to delegations of authority from it, or (3) to prejudice or to abate any action taken or any right accruing or accrued, or any suit or proceeding had or commenced in any civil cause; but any court having on its docket a case to which the War Contracts Price Adjustment Board is a party, on motion or supplemental petition filed at any time within 12 months after the effective date of this section, showing a necessity for the survival of such suit, action, or other proceeding to obtain a determination of the questions involved, may allow the same to be maintained by or against the United States.

(i) Renegotiation Act not repealed: Except as by this act specifically amended or modified, all provisions of the Renegotiation Act shall remain in full force and effect.

(j) Definitions: The terms which are defined in the Renegotiation Act shall, when used in this section, have the same meaning as when used in the Renegotiation Act, except that where a renegotiation function has been transferred by or pursuant to law the terms "Secretary" or "Secretaries" and "Department" or "Departments" shall be understood to refer to the successors in function to those officers or offices specifically named in the Renegotiation Act.

(k) Effective date of section: This section shall take effect 60 days after the date of the enactment of this act.

SEC. 202. Period of limitations for Renegotiation Act of 1948.

No proceeding under the Renegotiation Act of 1948 to determine the amount of excessive profits for any fiscal year shall be commenced more than 1 year after the mandatory statement required by the regulations issued pursuant to such act is filed with respect to such year, or more than 6 months after the date of the enactment of this title, whichever is the later, and if such proceeding is not so commenced (in the manner provided by the regulations prescribed pursuant to such act), all liabilities of the contractor or subcontractor under such act for excessive profits received or accrued during such fiscal year shall thereupon be discharged. If an agreement or order determining the amount of excessive profits under such act is not made within 2 years following the commencement of the renegotiation proceeding, then upon the expiration of such 2 years all liabilities of the contractor or subcontractor for excessive profits with respect to which such proceeding was commenced shall thereupon be discharged, except that (1) such 2-year period may be extended by mutual agreement, and (2) if within such 2 years such an order is duly issued pursuant to such act, such 2-year limitation shall not apply to the review of such order by any renegotiation board duly authorized to undertake such review.

SEC. 203. Amendment of section 3806 of the Internal Revenue Code.

Section 3806 (a) (1) of the Internal Revenue Code is hereby amended by striking out subparagraphs (A), (B), and (C) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(A) The term 'renegotiation' includes any transaction which is a renegotiation within the meaning of the Federal Renegotiation Act applicable to such transaction, any modification of one or more contracts with the United States or any agency thereof, and any agreement with the United States or any agency thereof in respect of one or more such contracts or subcontracts thereunder.

"(B) The term 'excessive profits' includes any amount which constitutes excessive profits within the meaning assigned to such term by the applicable Federal Renegotiation Act, any part of the contract price of a contract with the United States or any agency thereof, any part of the subcontract price of a subcontract under such a contract, and any profits derived from one or more such contracts or subcontracts.

"(C) The term 'subcontract' includes any purchase order or agreement which is a subcontract within the meaning assigned to such term by the applicable Federal Renegotiation Act.

"(D) The term 'Federal Renegotiation Act' includes section 403 of the Sixth Supplemental National Defense Appropriation Act (Public 528, 77th Cong., 2d sess.), as amended or supplemented, the Renegotiation Act of 1948, as amended or supplemented, and the Renegotiation Act of 1951, as amended or supplemented."

SEC. 204. Separability provision.

If any provision of this act or the application of any provision to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the act and of the application of its provisions to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

Mr. COOPER (interrupting the reading of the bill). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the bill be dispensed with and that it be printed in the RECORD at this point, and that points of order and amendments be in order at any point in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 23, line 9, strike out "(G)" and insert "(g)."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer another committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 31, line 9, insert before the comma the following: "and does not make an agreement with the contractor or subcontractor with respect to the elimination of excessive profits."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer another committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 42, line 18, strike out "Renegotiation Act" and insert "renegotiation act."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONAS:

On page 33, line 25, after the word "shall", strike out the word "not."

On page 34, line 1, before the period insert the following: "if within 5 days after the filing of the petition the petitioner files with the Tax Court a good and sufficient bond approved by such court in such amount as may be fixed by the court."

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONAS. I yield.

Mr. MILLS. I have discussed the gentleman's amendment with some of the members of the committee on this side and we see no objection to it. It may be that some changes will have to be made elsewhere in the bill, but the idea of the gentleman's amendment seems to be sound. I might call the gentleman's attention to the fact that, although it was not contained in the law during World War II, the filing of a bond with the Department of Justice would stay the execution of an order of the Board. There was an informal arrangement worked out to accomplish the same result so the gentleman's amendment is somewhat in keeping with that past practice. We have no objection to the amendment on this side.

Mr. JONAS. If the gentleman will assure me that whatever he proposes to do on the over-all picture will not change the substance but merely the form, I am satisfied.

Mr. MILLS. That is a fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JONAS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, we want to get through with this bill. After we get through with it the gentleman can have an opportunity to speak.

Mr. BENDER. If you want to object, that is your privilege.

Mr. COOPER. I can object, but I do not want to unless I have to. I will not object at this time, but I will object to any further request to speak out of order. We want to get through with this bill and not talk about everything else under the sun.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, I think that last comment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] was entirely uncalled for. I have been here during this debate and I have heard many things discussed that were not a part of this bill. The gentleman from Tennessee took no exception to any part of any Member's utterances. I merely rose to call attention to the fact that this is a bill that apparently we all agree to. There is no disagreement. I want to emphasize that, as I want to emphasize the issue that was up here last Friday when there was no disagreement of any kind. Why do I do this? Simply to call attention to the fact that during campaign time in the northern part of the United States members of the Democratic Party on every occasion charged the minority party, the Republicans with being the tail to the southern Democratic kite. They never missed an opportunity to allege that Republicans were pulling the chestnuts out of the fire daily for the South. Obviously, this is not one of those days. And I want to emphasize it. Many times we find ourselves in accord.

During the Eightieth Congress I voted for a continuation of the excise tax for a time because our Government was operated extravagantly and because our expenses were exorbitant. My opponent in the last campaign, a Member of this body last year, repeatedly asserted that I voted to make excise taxes permanent. At no time did any majority party Member rise to correct him, nor did any minority party Member rise to keep the record straight.

When a bill was considered here last year repealing the excise taxes, a few majority members of the Ways and Means Committee had a field day commending him—and he was on the tail end of the committee—commending him for his great work in having the excise taxes repealed. But the taxes were not repealed. We found ourselves in the throes of another New Deal emergency. Taxes went up instead. All the taxpayers got was conversation.

Frankly, in the interest of fair play, I simply wanted to emphasize the point that the country should have in mind, that we Republicans are not the tail to anybody's kite. When we feel that an issue deserves support, we support it, not because it comes from the North or from the South or from the East or the West. I think it is important that we Republicans who are in the minority understand that the majority party at election time, in order to control the House, to gain the forty or fifty close districts where the vote is quite even, stuff that down our throats. So I wanted to make it clear that this is a day when we are voting unanimously on an issue because we believe in it.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, because he is one of those of whom I spoke.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I want to say to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, that our friend the former Member from Ohio, Mr. Young, was very active and very effective in his efforts to have the excise taxes repealed. He was just as anxious as the minority membership on the committee and as the majority membership on the committee, and he worked very effectively in his efforts to repeal excise taxes, and deserves credit for it.

Mr. BENDER. I am glad to have the gentleman's contribution about his New Deal brother. I wish the Ways and Means Committee came forward with a lot of tax repealers, but how in the world can you repeal any tax with a Government as wasteful as this odious regime that has run Washington for the last 17 years.

The only tax reductions we have had in a dozen or more years came as a result of the performance of the Eightieth Congress.

Whenever anyone tells our Federal administrators that we should start in at once to cut down on Washington spending, he is promptly asked the question, "Where?" Dozens of answers have been suggested, but none has ever found general acceptance by a Government determined to maintain its civilian personnel at the highest possible level. Senator HARRY BYRD, of Virginia, has proposed several alternative budgets in recent years. All have been commended, but not one has ever been tried by the Government.

Within the past week there has been much discussion of his plan to reduce nonmilitary expenditures by approximately $7,000,000,000. When we remember that the Federal budget for the fiscal year from June 30, 1951, to July 1, 1952, contemplates expenditures of $75,000,000,000, with estimated revenues figured at only fifty-one billions, the necessity for sharp cutting of our spending program becomes all too obvious. There is every reason to believe that the $25,000,000,000 deficit estimated for the coming year will be matched in other years to come.

Senator BYRD has suggested that we trim the postal deficit by $3,600,000,000; cut our civilian payroll in the military departments by 150,000 persons—we now have 1 civilian for every 2 men in uniform; reduce our foreign-aid program to $500,000,000 from the present four billions in view of our military assistance plans for oversea aid. These three items would achieve the $7,000,000,000 savings. The time to start on an honest effort to save these vast sums is now.

Mr. MEADER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MEADER: Page 27, line 1, strike out all of subsection (c) from line 1, page 27, to and including line 9, on page 28.

Mr. MEADER. Mr. Chairman, it is with some hesitation that I offer this amendment, but I believe that a caveat should be inserted in the RECORD and that some observations should be made concerning these permissive exemptions.

First of all, let me say that my attitude on this proposal is based upon the general principle that legislation for this country should be enacted here in the Congress and not in the departments downtown. The granting of this very broad authority to add to the exemptions which Congress has seen fit to make, in my judgment, delegates legislative authority to the Board created by this bill far beyond what is wise.

Second, let me call attention to the fact that the Board possessing this discretion will be subjected to pressures from war contractors on all sides who claim that they can come within one or the other of the five provisions of this subsection. I think the pressures might sometimes not be resisted effectively by the Board if it is a politically appointed Board.

There is a great opportunity in this particular discretion for discrimination and favoritism, and you know what human weakness is. Furthermore, these permissive exemptions are wholly unnecessary. If a contractor has no profits he will not be hurt by renegotiation; if he has profits he ought to be subjected to renegotiation under the very broad standards which the act sets up.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEADER. I yield.

Mr. MILLS. Would the gentleman want the Renegotiation Board to go through the process of renegotiation, to subject the contractor to all the problems of renegotiation, when on the face of it the contract itself indicates that there are no excessive profits? The reason I ask the question is that, if the gentleman's amendment prevails, that would be the unavoidable result, for there would be no authority whatsoever to exempt any contractor with receipts or accruals in excess of $100,000, regardless.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEADER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VORYS. If I understood, there was no contract required to be negotiated under this general law. Am I wrong about it?

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman is wrong. All contracts with these departments amounting to $100,000 or more are subjected to the jurisdiction of this Board and to renegotiation. We are attempting here to give the Renegotiation Board the authority to eliminate certain contracts where there does not appear to be excessive profits, but if the gentleman's amendment prevails there will be no such authority in the Board.

Mr. VORYS. The gentleman said that all contracts over $100,000 may be negotiated. As I understand it, no one expects that every contract over $100,000 in connection with the defense program is going to be renegotiated.

Mr. MEADER. Mr. Chairman, let me point out that the time consumed in a preliminary audit in renegotiation is not extensive. I understand renegotiation agents do not need to go as thoroughly into some contracts as others. If it appears from a preliminary examination that there are no renegotiable profits they do not have to make a more complete examination. I want to point out further that a good deal of time and expense will be saved by the Board if it is not subjected to pressure by war contractors who want to be exempted. Let me point out further that where a contractor has an exempted contract and another contract which is not exempt, he may attempt to throw all of his costs against the contract that is not exempted and make all of his profits on the one which is.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MEADER].

Mr. Chairman, certainly we commend the gentleman for the laudable purpose he undoubtedly wishes to accomplish, but the effect of his amendment would go much further than he himself contemplates.

This provision of the bill contains permissive exemptions, those exemptions which are apparent on their face to the Board should be made. Regardless of how apparent it might be that it is not the type of contract that should be negotiated, under the terms of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan the Board would have no discretion and would have to put the contractor to all of the expense and difficulty of negotiating the contract when no useful purpose could be served for the Government and no benefit could be secured by the contractor.

Mr. Chairman, those who are in charge of this program, who appeared before the committee and who have worked with us all along step by step in the preparation of this bill, feel that these five minimum standards of permissive exemptions are vitally essential to the proper administration of this act in giving a type of fair and equitable consideration to the contractors and businessmen of this country to which they are justly entitled.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MEADER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, in the discussion between the gentleman from Arkansas and myself a few moments ago, he called attention to subsection (f) of section 103 in the bill which begins at the bottom of page 5 and runs over to page 6.

In line 5, page 6, it is stated:

All items estimated to be allowable as deductions and exclusions under chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code shall, to the extent allocable to such contracts and subcontracts, be allowed as items of cost, except that no amount shall be allowed as an item of cost by reason of the application of a carry-over or carry-back.

Then the paragraph goes on to its conclusion.

Section 109, page 34, authorizes the Board to make such rules, regulations, and orders as it deems necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of this title.

I would like to ask the gentleman from Arkansas, in order that we may fully understand this, whether it is the intent of the committee that the rules, regulations, and laws governing the Internal Revenue Bureau under the Internal Revenue Code and its regulations issued pursuant thereto are intended to apply exclusively in this matter of cost determination, and whether it is his belief that by the Board making such rules and regulations we can thereby obviate the necessity that has existed in the past for contractors and subcontractors to keep as many sets of books as the number of departments they are doing business with, plus one set for the Internal Revenue people and one set of books for the General Accounting Office?

Mr. MILLS. In response to the gentleman, permit me to say it is certainly the intention of the committee that costs which are allowable for income-tax purposes shall be allowable for renegotiation purposes to the extent allocable. That is what we say here in this language on page 6 of the bill, so that there will be no need of keeping one set of cost records for tax purposes and another set of records for renegotiation.

Mr. HINSHAW. I appreciate the gentleman's statement, and I only hope that this bill reads in such a way that the Board under its terms will have the power to order and direct that all of these agencies of government that make contracts with contractors shall follow the same cost-accounting procedure.

Mr. MILLS. May I interrupt the gentleman further?

Mr. HINSHAW. Indeed.

Mr. MILLS. I think I can assure the gentleman that this is the exact understanding of all of the departments which have had anything to do with the consideration of this bill, including the Bureau of the Budget, which worked with these departments in attempting to bring all of the various departments together in harmony upon this one subject. Certainly, what I have said to the gentleman is the intention of the committee, and I think I can say it is clearly understood to be the purpose of the bill in this particular language, and that there will be no argument in its administration, provided this language is retained in the final bill.

Mr. HINSHAW. If the gentleman and his committee have accomplished that much, if nothing else, in the course of the work done on this bill, they will have saved to the Government a very great deal of money for cost accounting. As is well known by every contractor, they have to keep innumerable sets of books, and ultimately the Government pays the bill.

Mr. MILLS. Not only have we attempted to do that, but permit me to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that we have attempted to eliminate in here, by stating our intentions in the report, the duplication of offices within the same location. Now the gentleman lives in a very populous area of California. It may have been that there were six or seven renegotiation offices in Los Angeles.

Mr. HINSHAW. Indeed, there were.

Mr. MILLS. It is the hope of the committee that renegotiation under this bill may be handled in such a way as to avoid any such duplication.

Mr. HINSHAW. Now, I have one final question, and that is this:

Mr. MILLS. Would the gentleman yield to me 1 minute before he propounds another question?

Mr. HINSHAW. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. Permit me to call the attention of the gentleman to the language on page 22, line 7, which reads:

In the interest of economy and the avoidance of duplication of inspection and audit, the services of the Bureau of Internal Revenue shall, upon request of the board and the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, be made available to the extent determined by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of making examinations and audits under this title.

Mr. HINSHAW. I thank the gentleman. I had noticed the paragraph, but thought that was merely a matter of transfer of personnel. At this point I think that I should include in the RECORD recommendations Nos. 62 and 63 of the Congressional Aviation Policy Board of the Eightieth Congress as contained in its report, same being Senate Report No. 949 of the Eightieth Congress, second session, as follows:

62. The National Military Establishment, in collaboration with the General Accounting Office and the Bureau of Internal Revenue should be directed (after examining the views of organizations capable of reflecting industry's difficulties under present accounting practices) to establish a single set of rules applying to audit and determination of costs under contracts of the National Military Establishment, and in agreement with the General Accounting Office, prescribe the normal time for completing the audit and the issuance of a suitable certificate or other for ... of final clearance (except for fraud).

There exist three different Government regulations under which costs of Government contracts are determined. They emanate separately from the Army, Navy, Bureau of Internal Revenue, and General Accounting Office.

The decisions of the Comptroller General often place an entirely different interpretation on what constitutes allowable costs. No manual is available to contractors outlining basis for decisions. Such decisions are given after the cost has been incurred; disallowances are retroactive in effect, penalizing the contractor.

Resulting complications make it desirable to establish a definitive uniform policy with respect to costs and expenses allowable under Government contracts, eliminating different interpretations by three Government agencies.

Proper function of General Accounting Office should be a review of settlement procedure and final audit, rather than duplication of audit and administrative interpretation of contracts.

The cost-plus-fixed-fee contract must continue for highly technical research and long-range developments, cost of which cannot be predetermined for bid purposes under fixed-price contracts, but the contracting agency should be able to change objectives and methods of performance for such contracts to meet changes in military needs occurring as effort progresses.

All companies must subject themselves to audit of the Bureau of Internal Revenue for income-tax assessment. The taxpayer can be best served if other procurement agencies of Government (Army, Navy, and Air Force) agree to accept the principles of the Internal Revenue Code for determination of allowable costs.

63. The Congress should enact legislation authorizing contract termination procedure for peacetime procurement, similar to the procedure provided for in the Contract Settlement Act of 1944.

The Contract Settlement Act of 1944 permitted the Government to accomplish an outstanding task in terminating and liquidating of World War II commitments. So far as the aircraft manufacturing industry is concerned, it is believed that those commitments were thoroughly and efficiently settled. Without new legislation, industry will return to the confused legal situation which existed between World War I and World War II. In that period question prevailed as to whether any settlement by agreement could be made, or, if made, could withstand the General Accounting Office rulings.

Present joint procurement regulations of the Air Force and Army provide for a so-called formula settlement of contracts. Formula settlements were tried prior to enactment of the Contract Settlement Act and found unsatisfactory both to industry and the services. The only effect of the formula is to predetermine percentage and amount of profit to be allowed on the termination portion. This is rarely a source of disagreement. Real source of disagreement and, therefore, of delay and possible litigation is almost always the question of whether certain items of cost are applicable. Under a formula settlement, or any settlement procedure other than negotiation, there develops strong tendency to excessive detail over the many thousands of items of cost going into claims. As a result, there are often differences of opinion.

Validity of a negotiated termination agreement is comparable to that of a negotiated procurement contract. Insofar as contracts for aeronautical equipment are concerned, it is desirable that negotiation be recognized as a usual means of Government contracting and settlement of Government obligations.

Authority to negotiate final settlement is particularly important insofar as industry's subcontractor and supplier claims are concerned. Unless the prime contractor is certain the settlement he negotiates is final, he will delay settlements with subcontractors.

Provisions should be made for immediate partial payments on termination claims. This is a financial necessity to both prime and subcontractors: First, because of the large values involved in many prime contracts in relation to the contractor's working capital; second, because in the preliminary stages of preparing a termination claim, supporting material is not in shape to be readily acceptable as collateral for a commerical banking loan.

Many contractors are working with minimum floor space. There is also considerable responsibility and liability connected with storage, preservation and accounting for raw material, equipment, semifinished parts, and other inventory items supporting a termination claim. It is important that Government-owned property be removed from facilities at earliest date.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that one purpose of the bill is to obtain munitions of war at the lowest possible cost, that another is to prevent the making of excess profits on war contracts. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLS], when I put a question to him as to the construction of facilities for training those called into the service, just sought to treat it facetiously.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MILLS. I thought I answered the gentleman's question by saying that that type of contract was covered by this bill.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I did not understand that to be the answer at all.

Mr. MILLS. If the gentleman will read the RECORD, he will see.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. All right; I will read it. What I am getting at is this: As we very well know, during the last war when the Government was called upon to build facilities on two camps within a few miles of Washington the carpenters, the plumbers, the mechanics, artisans, and everyone else who came down here to work on the job was required to pay a union fee of from $25 up before they could go to work on those jobs. If they did not have the $25 they had to get a work permit. Two dollars and fifty cents a week they had to pay, and I have some of the permits and receipts that were granted at that time in the office to this day. That may not seem very important, but if we are trying to save money for the Government, why should we not go after that excess profit to the union?

For example, in one case over here, and the hearings in the Senate disclosed it, they collected more than half a million dollars in work-permit fees. Just why should a patriotic American citizen who wants to help build training quarters, perhaps for his son, be required to buy from some organization which is not a Government agency a permit to work, and why should not that practice of levying tribute be stopped just as well as the excess-profits racket—and I am in favor of stopping the excess-profits racket.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MILLS. I know the gentleman knows more about the subject than I do, but I think the gentleman will agree that there is a provision in the Taft-Hartley Act that applies to this very matter.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. No. The question of charging a fee before the man proceeds to work on the job is taken care of in the Taft-Hartley Act by a provision that the fee must not be excessive. They not only charge you for a work permit but under the act they can still, as it is enforced or not enforced, levy a tax or a dues payment on you for political purposes, and they do. So not only you cannot work on a defense job until you have paid the union fee, but you must contribute to the opposition political party.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, on the subject of Government contracts, I have a letter here from a rather important citizen in my home town. I am not going to divulge his name or the names of the contractors. Here is the letter, and there is nothing phony about it because I know him very personally and intimately. This man runs a big sales agency. He says, "A customer of mine received a contract from the Quartermaster Corps to supply" certain equipment, and he specifies here what it is, for a certain defense base, that I am very familiar with because it is one of our very powerful outposts. "This equipment is so vital it is being shipped by air several hundred miles," and I can say it is some thousands of miles, flown from the Tri-City airport in my home town.

He says, "However, before the contract was completed, Mr. So-and-So had to state that all employees connected with this operation were members of the Democratic Party."

I call that to the attention of the Defense Committee of this House. If that is a fact, this dictionary over here does not carry the language in which I should like to express myself. If we are still playing that kind of a game, I think the fellows who enforce it should be tarred and feathered and thrown in the river, and let them swim as best they can. That is low-down skulduggery which is almost indefinable if that is true, and I think this fellow is a pretty truthful citizen in my home town.

I would like to ask the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLS] a question, or any member of the committee. In establishing the cost on a contract which is renegotiated for income-tax purposes, cannot the manufacturer use the cost which is determined in the final renegotiation in ariving at his taxable income?

Mr. MILLS. I presume that would be permitted, but I must admit to the gentleman there is nothing in the bill specifically on that point. We take the reverse approach, that costs allowed for internal revenue purposes are allowable for renegotiation, but we do not take the course suggested by the gentleman.

Mr. CRAWFORD. May I put it this way, then. Suppose I am manufacturing for the Government and I close my tax year. Let us put it on a calendar-year basis. Suppose 2 years later the contract is renegotiated and we have a new concept of taxable income. The law protects me in going back and readjusting my tax return, does it not, to conform to the renegotiation?

Mr. MILLS. Oh, yes. The gentleman is correct on that point. In other words, the gentleman has paid taxes on more than the Renegotiation Board has left him in the way of profits?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. Certainly he would then be in a position to go back and recapture what he paid in to the internal revenue in excess of his actual taxes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That would be in every case?

Mr. MILLS. That is right.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Otherwise, the whole set-up would be inequitable. Why would it be necessary to keep two sets of books under the old scheme?

Mr. MILLS. I do not believe it is necessary to keep two sets under this bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It seems to me that would be confusing to both the manufacturer and the Government.

Mr. MILLS. It certainly would, both to the manufacturer and the Government.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If it were required to keep two sets of books, that would protect nobody in itself, would it?

Mr. MILLS. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That was the point I wanted to clear up with respect to income-tax liability.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the committee to answer this question. Is there anything in this bill which requires all contracts over $100,000 to be renegotiated?

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS. I yield.

Mr. MILLS. The bill gives the Renegotiation Board authority to renegotiate all contracts with these seven named departments.

Mr. VORYS. I understand that.

Mr. MILLS. That is, where the contractor himself has received or accrued in excess of $100,000 within a year's time. I take it that means the Renegotiation Board must look at all such contracts for the purposes of renegotiation. Under the discretionary authority given in the bill, the Board could throw out certain contracts without, shall we say, molesting the contractor, because it appears on the face of the contract that there could not have been excess profits.

Mr. VORYS. That is true. The Board does not have to renegotiate. Take, for instance, a contract for $100,000,000 with some great corporation for tanks, not within the list of permissive exemptions on pages 27 and 28. The Board might have somebody look at it and if they do not want to renegotiate it and the contractor does not want it renegotiated, there is nothing in the law which requires either party to go through the form of renegotiation when neither the Board nor the contractor think there is anything to be renegotiated. Is that not true?

Mr. MILLS. I presume the gentleman might be correct, if it is clear that the performance of the contract has not resulted in any excess profits. But I would like to ask the gentleman if he will yield further, whether he, as a member of the Board, without some discretionary authority, would feel safe in assuming that responsibility when the Congress had not given him authority to grant exemptions.

Mr. VORYS. I cannot find any limit at all on the Board's discretion to exempt. I am just trying to find out what this bill provides. I cannot find anything in the bill that provides that the Renegotiation Board is required even to review all the contracts. I cannot find anything in there that requires them to renegotiate. Therefore, the Board has the power to play favorites, if you please. It has the power to say to a great big contractor, not within the class of exempted contracts, "We do not think there is any excess profit here. We are not going to send you any notice. We are not going to do anything." The Board also has the discretion to ignore that contract altogether, and never look at it at all, never do anything at all about it. That company would be perfectly satisfied, and my guess would be there will be thousands of contracts that would never be renegotiated. I just want to find out whether I am correct in my analysis of what this bill provides.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman has the bill before him. On page 2, beginning in line 9, section 102 says:

> The provisions of this title shall be applicable to all contracts within the Departments specifically named.

Mr. VORYS. That is correct.

Mr. MILLS. Further on in the bill the Board is authorized and directed to renegotiate.

Mr. VORYS. Of course there is authority to renegotiate, but where is there any direction to renegotiate? I find on page 12 that renegotiation proceedings shall be commenced by mailing a notice, but I do not find anything in the bill that says there shall be renegotiation proceedings in the case of every contract. I do not think there should be, but I think that the Board's authority and duty ought to be made clear. Frankly, I have not been able to find it. I have asked at both committee tables and I have been unable to have the members direct me to the place in the bill where it says whether or not the Board has to review all contracts.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS. Yes; I yield. I am looking for information.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Is it the gentleman's point that if the Board saw fit there would not necessarily be any renegotiation?

Mr. VORYS. That is right. I think that in the law some place somebody in the Government ought to be required at least to take a quick look over all contracts and either say he does or does not think the contract should be renegotiated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. CURTIS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 1 minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS of Nebraska. I think what the gentleman is contending for is in there, in that the power of the Board to grant exceptions to the law is very definitely limited. That would imply that it applied to all other contracts unless specifically exempted in the act or exempted in the manner provided for in the power delegated to the Board.

Mr. VORYS. It seems to me that if that is all the provision there is in this bill requiring a review of all contracts, it is a poor way to go about it. I have no quarrel with the machinery set up for renegotiation, but it would appear to me that there ought to be some place in the act where a requirement for some sort of review of all contracts is put in.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. In that respect it is exactly the same as the law in effect during World War II, and $200,000,000,000 worth of contracts were renegotiated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS] has again expired.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HINSHAW. Is a Member entitled to be recognized twice under a pro forma amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman has another amendment, the Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

I shall not take all the time allotted. I just want to ask the gentlemen of the committee one more question, if I may, in order to clarify my own thinking concerning this bill, and perhaps clarify it for others. That is in respect to the audits that are to be made. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] I believe referred to the procedures that were engaged in during World War II and, subsequent thereto, in connection with renegotiation. Audits were made, of course, by the establishment of the Government making the contract. Audits were again made by the renegotiation groups in those agencies at the time that the renegotiation was effected and then all papers were sent to the General Accounting Office where a new and separate audit was to be made at which time, as I understand it, the question of fraud could be brought up.

There were several audits and accountings to be made. Do I read this bill correctly, as providing in one section that after the Board finishes with its audits and after acceptance of renegotiation figures, then there would be no question of fraud brought up in connection with it unless that fraud were palpably evident or something to that effect? Is that a correct statement of the fact?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. I think the gentleman has made an accurate statement of the situation. Bear in mind that, as I recall, only those cases were subject to review by the General Accounting Office where fraud was alleged.

Mr. HINSHAW. I think the gentleman will find that every one of them has gone to the General Accounting Office and that they have gone over them with a great deal of care.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. MILLS. I think the gentleman is right—that all these procurement contracts would ultimately go to the General Accounting Office, but that the General Accounting Office had no general authority to upset a determination that excessive profits had or had not been shown.

Mr. HINSHAW. No; but the books do go to the General Accounting Office.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman is correct, because they have to do with procurement.

Mr. HINSHAW. And the General Accounting Office, as I understand, acts for and on behalf of the Congress and declares whether or not certain expenditures are in accordance with the laws of the United States as they interpret them. Is not that correct?

Mr. MILLS. And that the General Accounting Office has made certain declarations with regard to items of cost under the contracts, declarations with which the gentleman from California is familiar.

Mr. HINSHAW. I am just trying to eliminate as many steps as may be possible because of the great expense involved and the long delays that are necessary to accomplish audits of very complicated sets of books.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no further amendments, under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. THOMAS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1724) to provide for the renegotiation of contracts, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 87, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 377, nays 0, not voting 57, as follows:

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. BONNER (at the request of Mr. MILLS) was given permission to address the House for 20 minutes on Thursday next, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday may be dispensed with this week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I was here but unable to answer to my name on the last roll call; I did not hear my name called. I would have voted "aye" on that roll call.

THE PACIFIC PACT

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, a bipartisan group of eight members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs—Representatives BATTLE, JUDD, MANSFIELD, MERROW, MORGAN, RIBICOFF, ZABLOCKI, and myself—is today sponsoring a resolution seeking a Pacific pact for the Pacific Ocean area. Two members of this group—Mr. RIBICOFF and myself—are also today sponsoring a resolution favoring an organization for far eastern economic cooperation. Both programs of self-help and mutual cooperation for defense and for economic development are to be joined in by the United States. These efforts are to be considered in the context of the negotiation of the Japanese Peace Treaty for which John Foster Dulles left yesterday.

The resolutions represent together an affirmative United States foreign policy for the Far East, with the primary responsibility placed where it belongs, on the peoples affected, but with the United States backing them in their efforts. It recognizes the fact that the eastern shore of the Pacific Ocean is the strategic frontier of the United States itself. This effort initiated today recognizes the adulthood of the free peoples of Asia and puts them on a parity in American consideration with the mature nations of Western Europe with whom we have developed the Atlantic Pact and the European recovery program. In such a framework of regional organization within the United Nations Charter, the development of Japanese military capabilities for the defense of the Japanese islands and of Japanese industrial production for the economic improvement so urgently needed by the free peoples of Asia, can proceed without the overhanging fear that a new aggressor "Frankenstein" might be created.

Had this action been taken a year and a half ago when we first initiated these proposals, we would not now be facing so desperate a situation with respect to the Far East. Yet it is never too late to try to correct past errors and the Dulles mission gives us a new point of departure for a Pacific pact and an opportunity for far eastern economic cooperation we should not miss.

PRICE AND WAGE CONTROL

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, anti-inflation controls over prices and wages are almost with us. Naturally, we are reluctant to accept these controls, but without them, and with an administration which makes no effort to restrain this Government's spending, the great mass of people would be unfairly hurt.

The mention of controls naturally brings to mind the complicated problem of enforcement. During the last war under OPA, we saw the growth of a huge bureau of policemen, who labored to first fix, then enforce, price levels on almost every item sold in open commerce. This was extremely wasteful, in money and manpower. Simpler methods could have been devised, as they were in World War I, and I know the man in charge this time, Mr. Eric Johnston, will realize that the public will be glad to do a major part of the policing job free.

The secret, of course, is making known to the public the controlled prices of the items for sale. These prices should be posted in stores, and published in newspapers. The buying public will take care of the merchant who overcharges. Nothing registers more quickly with a merchant than a lack of customers.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article by Vannevar Bush.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE and Mr. POULSON asked and were given permission to extend their remarks.

Mr. D'EWART asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial.

Mr. JUDD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in three instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in four instances—and in one to include an address he delivered over Station WMEX, in another an address he delivered last Saturday night, and in the other two instances extraneous matter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in regard to the use of horses and mules in Korea.

Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article from the Nation's Business.

Mr. BARRETT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial from the Philadelphia Daily News.

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas asked and was given permission to extend his remarks.

Mr. GAVIN (at the request of Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts) was given permission to extend his remarks.

Mr. SHAFER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks.

Mr. MORANO asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article from the Greenwich Times of Greenwich, Conn.

Mr. MACK of Washington asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances, and in each include extraneous matter.

Mr. McDONOUGH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial from the Hollywood Citizen News.

Mr. DOYLE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include appropriate material.

Mr. DOLLINGER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.

ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. TACKETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. TACKETT. Mr. Speaker, I was on the floor of the House and participated in the debate on the bill just passed, but was called out of the Chamber and did not hear the bells ring announcing the roll call. For that reason I was not present at the time the roll was called. Had I been present I would have voted "yea."

MEMBERS OF JOINT COMMITTEES OF CONGRESS

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution, House Resolution 91, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the following-named Members be, and they are hereby, elected members of the following joint committees of Congress:

Joint Committee on Printing: Mr. Stanley, Virginia; Mr. Trimble, Arkansas; Mr. LeCompte, Iowa.

Joint Committee of Congress on the Library: Mr. Stanley, Virginia; Mr. Regan, Texas; Mr. Albert, Oklahoma; Mr. LeCompte, Iowa; Mr. Bishop, Illinois.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LEGISLATION DENYING AMERICAN AID TO COUNTRIES FURNISHING WAR MATERIALS TO RUSSIA AND COMMUNIST-DOMINATED COUNTRIES

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a measure that would deny American aid to foreign countries furnishing war materials to Russia and other Communist-dominated countries.

Under my proposed legislation, war materials and other financial assistance would not be furnished any foreign country unless and until such country has executed an agreement that it will not permit the export of war materials to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, or to other Communist-dominated countries.

Since the conclusion of World War II, the United States has extended economic and financial aid amounting to billions of dollars to many countries of the world under the UNRRA and the ECA.

In the past 6 months I have received many letters from people of Kansas who expressed amazement that the United States would permit countries receiving our military, economic, and financial aid to export strategic war materials to Russia, Communist China, and other Communist-dominated countries.

It is difficult to explain why we should furnish any goods to any country that would send war materials to the Communist Chinese who are presently destroying the lives of American boys.

Facts developed by congressional committees have been given widespread publicity. A local newspaper reported several months ago that the managing director of the second largest tool-manufacturing concern in Great Britain stated his organization was so taken up with orders for Russia that he could not furnish any materials, not even so much as a pin, to any British consumer for at least 2 years.

During 1949 Belgium, Luxemburg, France, and Great Britain exported to Russia and her satellite nations, millions of dollars worth of arms, explosives, iron, steel, aluminum, brass, copper, lead, zinc, tin, electrical goods, machinery, motor vehicles, chemicals, and optical, surgical, scientific, and photographic instruments and apparatus.

During the first half of 1950, Great Britain exported more than $6,000,000 worth of electrical machinery to Russia, and more than $1,000,000 worth of machine tools. This is almost 10 times the amount of machine tools exported by the British Empire to Russia during the same period in 1949.

I am hopeful that developments in Korea have had the effect of diminishing such activities on the part of beneficiary countries under ECA.

I am advised the Belgians, for example, will export this year 64,000 tons of steel products and 18,000 tons of copper, zinc, and other nonferrous metals to Russia.

While the people of the United States and our defense activities are feeling the shortage of rubber and rubber products, I am told that Britain today is transshipping Malayan rubber to Soviet ports. When the supplemental appropriations bill for fiscal year 1951 was under consideration in September 1950, Senator WHERRY proposed an amendment prohibiting economic or financial assistance to any country which exported to Russia or its satellites arms, armaments, or other material, metals or commodities which were useful in the manufacture of arms, armaments, or military materials. This amendment was rejected for a weaker substitute which is totally ineffective.

It is ridiculous for the United States to be spending billions of dollars in foreign aid which is being transformed or exchanged for military assistance to Russia through exports from certain foreign countries. Russia receives military assistance that is passed on to Communist China, which in turn is used for the destruction of the lives of American boys.

Our State Department's policy of appeasement ought to be revised. It should be a policy of firm determination to find out how the countries of the world are using the billions of dollars in economic and financial assistance furnished them by the people of America. The time has come when the countries of the world must decide whether they stand with the American people, who have been their benefactors and have given to them so generously, or whether they are selling out to Communist countries and their satellites.

The fence-straddling position of some of our friends has caused a good many of us great concern. It is inconsistent for our friends to accept our help and then export war materials to Communist countries who seek to destroy representative government wherever they find it.

The proposal I have submitted would also make it unlawful for any person, partnership, company, corporation, cooperative, organization, or enterprise that is doing business under the laws of the United States to export any war material to Communist-dominated countries. In my study of this matter I find there is no law or administrative order which prohibits the United States Government or any person or business in the United States from shipping war materials to Communist countries or to any nation for transshipment to such countries.

I believe Congress should take the initiative with respect to this matter. It is clear the President has the authority to take this action, but he has not done so. I think it is also clear that under the State Department's policy of appeasement toward China, such action also unwittingly extends similar appeasement to Russia through our friends and neighbors in Europe and Asia.

During the fiscal year which ends June 30, our Government will have spent almost $4,500,000,000 in military and economic assistance to foreign countries. The President's budget message on January 15 calls for $7,000,000,000 more for military and economic assistance to foreign countries.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, it is ridiculous to furnish financial assistance in this magnitude in an amount almost equivalent to the President's requested increase in taxes without sufficient control of the manner in which such funds are to be used by the countries who are the recipients of these funds. Certainly, we have a right, if we are going to spend this money, to know something about the purpose for which it is used.

If we are to believe that the international situation is as grave as it is pictured to be by the spokesmen for the administration, including the President, Secretary of State, and others, I think it is time for us to be more firm in our foreign policy. In extending our friendship, aid, and assistance to the free democracies of the world, and in helping them to rehabilitate their industries, economies, and their people following the devastation of World War II, we must not unwittingly furnish communism with the tools of war.

If the international situation is as grave as it is said to be, we cannot have free trade as usual among all the nations of the world. The United States Government must take necessary steps to salvage what little is left from the mistakes and ridiculous commitments which have been made in the past 4 years by our State Department.

If our Government approves the expenditure of approximately $12,000,000,000 for military and economic assistance abroad over a 2-year period it is extremely important that this Congress enact legislation such as I have introduced today. This proposed legislation will, in my judgment, help protect our investments in democracy at home as well as abroad.

Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely wrong that the United States of America should pour billions of dollars in materials and funds into other countries who, in turn, furnish war materials to those who are destroying the lives of our boys and who would destroy our country if they could.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. JACKSON of Washington (at the request of Mr. MANSFIELD) on account of illness.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, January 24, 1951, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

109. A letter from the Chairman, Reconstruction Finance Corporation, transmitting a draft of a proposed joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to repeal the first two sentences of section 9 (a) of the Rubber Act of 1948, as amended"; to the Committee on Armed Services.

110. A letter from the Acting Attorney General, transmitting copies of orders of the Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service suspending deportation, as well as a list of the persons involved; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

111. A letter from the Acting Attorney General, transmitting copies of the orders of the Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service granting the application for permanent residence filed by the subjects of such orders, pursuant to section 4 of the Displaced Persons Act of 1948, as amended; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

112. A letter from the Deputy Attorney General, transmitting a draft of a proposed bill entitled "A bill to provide means of further securing and protecting the civil rights of persons within the jurisdiction of the United States"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

113. A letter from the Deputy Attorney General, transmitting a draft of a proposed bill entitled "A bill to amend sections 544 and 546 of title 28, United States Code"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 3 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BARING:

H. R. 1933. A bill to provide for the eradication and control of poisonous weeds, especially Halogeton glomeratus, on range and pasture lands in the several States and Territories, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. BRAMBLETT:

H. R. 1934. A bill to confirm and establish the titles of the States to lands and resources in and beneath navigable waters within State boundaries and to provide for the use and control of said lands and resources; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H. R. 1935. A bill to create, and assign duties to, the office of Assistant Secretary of the Navy for the Marine Corps, to fix the personnel strength of the United States Marine Corps, and to make the Commandant of the Marine Corps a permanent member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. D'EWART (by request):

H. R. 1936. A bill to transfer to the Indian tribes of Montana control over their tribal funds; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. DOLLINGER:

H. R. 1937. A bill to enable the people of Puerto Rico to select their form of government; to the Commmittee on Public Lands.

By Mr. FORAND:

H. R. 1938. A bill relating to the use for Federal tax purposes of the last-in, first-out inventory method; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. REES of Kansas:

H. R. 1939. A bill to provide that war materials, or economic or financial assistance, shall not be furnished to any foreign country which permits the export of war materials to Russia and other Communist-dominated countries, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BUCHANAN:

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

19. By Mr. TALLE: Petition of Mrs. Dudley Thomas and approximately 3,000 other residents of Dubuque, Iowa, demanding that American troops be withdrawn from Korea; that no American troops be sent abroad to fight communism until Communists within the United States are deported or imprisoned; that the Congress, not the President, shall have ultimate authority in military and political matters; that the exportation of vital materials be prohibited until stockpiles are accumulated in the United States; that the United States refuse economic assistance to all countries that trade with our Communist enemies; to the Committee on Armed Services.

20. By the SPEAKER: Petition of Chester P. Sorenson, executive director, Employment Security Commission of Wyoming, Casper, Wyo., requesting the Congress to enact suitable legislation earmarking all moneys collected under the Federal Unemployment Tax Act for use as funds for Federal and State costs of administering the employment security program; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

21. Also, petition of Leovigildo N. Diapo, municipal mayor, Madalag, Philippines, requesting funds for the reconstruction of school buildings destroyed during the last war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 24, 1951

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the unshaken foundation of all our hopes and the unfailing source of all our blessings, grant that through the way of prayer we may enter into a deepening experience of Thy presence, peace, and power.

We rejoice that Thou art reminding us continually of the eternal truth that "they who wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary; they shall walk and not faint."

Inspire us during this day with a profounder sense of our individual responsibility in the building of a finer social order. Help us to feel that we never see life in the radiant splendor of its greatness and dignity until we interpret its meaning and value in terms of service for God and our fellow men.

We thank Thee for the high and holy privilege and vocation of being coworkers in establishing peace on earth and good will among men.

Hear us in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

AMENDING SECTION 5012 OF THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House Joint Resolution 87, amending section 5012 of the Internal Revenue Code.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That section 5012 of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to powers of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation to obtain data) is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) Subsections (a) and (b) shall be applied in accordance with their provisions without regard to Reorganization Plan No. 26 of 1950 or to any other reorganization plan becoming effective on, before, or after the date of the enactment of this subsection."

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, House Joint Resolution 87 relates to the powers of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation and its staff to secure data and information from the executive departments in connection with tax studies for the benefit of the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Finance. It is particularly important that this information be secured at this time because we are now engaged in an endeavor to raise additional taxes for the defense effort.

The power of the joint committee and its staff to obtain information and data from the executive departments is granted under section 5012 of the Internal Revenue Code which was enacted in the Revenue Act of 1942. At the time this act was passed it was deemed particularly important that in securing the data and information the joint committee and its staff should have the benefit of any information and experience accumulated by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and his officials in the enforcement of the internal revenue laws. For this reason the law provided that this information and data could be secured directly from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and his officials. Some question has now arisen as to the power of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation and its staff to secure this data and information directly from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and his officials because of Reorganization Plan No. 26, dated May 13, 1950.

The purpose of this resolution is merely to require the Commissioner and his officials to continue to furnish such information and data directly to the joint committee or its staff as required under section 5012 of the Internal Revenue Code and without regard to the effect of Reorganization Plan No. 26 or any other reorganization plan becoming effective on, before, or after the date of the enactment of the date of this joint resolution.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make the following comment on House Joint Resolution 87. We have a staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation which prepares data and information relating to tax legislation. It is very important that this staff have authority to secure information and data directly from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and his staff with respect to problems relating to taxation. Some of these problems arise in the field and others in the Bureau in Washington.

In 1942 Congress gave that power to the staff in section 5012 of the Internal Revenue Code. However, last year, by Reorganization Plan No. 26, dated May 13, 1950, this power is jeopardized by having statutory functions of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and his staff transferred to the Secretary.

While the Secretary of the Treasury, in an order dated July 31, 1950, has provided that employees and agencies of the Treasury shall continue to perform the functions they were authorized to perform immediately prior to the effective date of the reorganization plan, the statutory duty to furnish this data and information no longer rests in the Bureau of Internal Revenue but is dependent upon the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury and subject to such changes and conditions as he may deem advisable. I think it vital to sound tax legislation that the staff be able to confer and secure tax data and information directly from the Commissioner and his staff without interference from the Treasury.

This resolution restores the power formerly granted to the staff to secure this data and information directly from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and his staff without being hampered by Reorganization Plan No. 26 or any other reorganization plan. I heartily commend its passage.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a speech made by me appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 8, 1950, also a letter, a copy of a bill, and other material.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

[Mr. MANSFIELD addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. REGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and include an editorial from a newspaper in south Texas.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

[Mr. REGAN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

LET'S GET OUT OF UNITED NATIONS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, if anybody has any doubt but that we ought to get out of the so-called United Nations, let him read an editorial in today's Washington Daily News, which states that—

When the American resolution seeking to brand the Chinese Communists as aggressors in Korea was sidetracked by a 27-to-23 vote in the 60-member United Nations political committee the United States suffered its worst defeat in the UN's 5-year history.

The editorial goes on to say:

The defeat was sustained at the hands of the British, supported by India, France, Canada, the Asian-Arab bloc and the Scandinavian countries—nations for the most part, presumed to be our friends.

In other words, the very countries whose representatives voted the emergency and misled President Truman into sending our troops to die in Asia are now running out on us.

Let us get out of the United Nations, get out of Korea, stay out of Europe, get back to America, and look after our own affairs.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to address the House for 30 minutes on Monday next, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

RESHIPMENT OF RUBBER TO RUSSIA

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, while our representations to Great Britain have brought embargoes on a long list of strategic materials, hitherto sold to Russia and her satellites by the British, I am shocked to learn that one item of utmost importance to Michigan's automotive industry appears to have been overlooked.

Statistical reports show that in 1948, Great Britain imported and then exported again to Russia something less than 400 tons of crude natural rubber. In 1949 the total was less than 500 tons. But in the first 11 months of 1950, the total jumped to 9,878 tons, valued at $6,254,000.

These figures, of course, cover only rubber that was shipped from Malaya to England and then reshipped. It has been estimated that in the first 11 months of 1950, Soviet Russia bought about 62,600 tons directly from Malaya, as compared with 63,500 in the comparable period of the year previous.

But even yet the rubber plantations of Malaya are largely controlled by British and Dutch interests. Therefore it must have been with their knowledge and consent that this tremendous amount of crude natural rubber was shipped to Russia, presumably through Hong Kong.

There can be little doubt that the vehicles, such as tanks, trucks and mobile artillery, now being used by Chinese Communist troops against our troops in Korea, are equipped with tires and treads made from the rubber sold to Russia by our British and Dutch allies.

It is needless, I think, for me to ask if this kind of thing offers the real explanation for the soft attitude of the British and some other European countries toward the Chinese Communists. An attitude made clear by their apparent unwillingness to join in branding the Chinese Reds as Korean aggressors, and their apparent eagerness to grant the Chinese Reds a seat on the United Nations Security Council.

The net result of this policy of trading with our enemies, and thus in part keeping badly needed supplies of crude natural rubber from the United States, has adversely affected our automotive industry. Our Government has been forced this month to slash 7,650 tons of domestically manufactured synthetic rubber from the total available for civilian tires and other rubber goods.

Let me point out, however, that this cut in civilian tire output is partly the fault of our own Government. The Eightieth Congress provided that synthetic rubber plants with an annual capacity of 160,000 long tons, built during World War II, should be kept on a standby basis. These plants utilize alcohol in making synthetic rubber.

But now it develops that the Government sold or leased, without proper recapture clauses, so many alcohol producing plants, also built during World War II, that it is impossible now to get the synthetic rubber plants into capacity operation.

It seems that the Government is going to have to buy hundreds of thousands of gallons of alcohol from other countries. It is going to have to do so at war inflated prices, even to reach the standby plant capacity.

Then how are we going to reach the 850,000 tons that will have to be produced each year, if our natural crude rubber supplies from Indonesia should be cut off completely?

Meanwhile, millions of bushels of potatoes and grain, both of use in making industrial alcohol, go to waste or are used by the whisky distillers.

And let me conclude by asking: Where is the stockpile of natural rubber, authorized by Congress, and which our National Security Resources Board was supposed to build up over the past several years?

THE MARINE CORPS

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] has pointed out there are being today introduced into the House and into the other body a number of measures designed to establish a statutory strength for the United States Marine Corps and to provide for the appointment of the Commandant of the Marine Corps as a permanent member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. This proposal is not by any means a negative move on the part of the proponents of the measure. We do not minimize in any respect the tremendous and magnificent work being accomplished by the other branches of the Armed Services. We admire their exploits. Certainly none of us has anything but respect and good will toward every other branch of the armed services. However, the 40 Members of the other body, who are today introducing a bill and the presently indeterminate number in this body, do feel that the time has arrived after more than 175 years of illustrious service to this country to insure that the United States Marine Corps on its record and by its exploits is granted the protection that this legislation would give it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

WHAT WILL GREAT BRITAIN DO FOR US?

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I have been saying right along that we could not count on England to aid us in the United Nations—she naturally would not because she can get all the money from us she needs and some she does not need, and in the meantime she carries on a brisk trade with Communist countries. She has officially recognized the Red regime in China. She always looks out for her trade and at the present time, she is selling critical war material to our enemies.

A vote is about to be taken in the United Nations as to whether Communist China is an aggressor in South Korea or not. Do not count on England—she will at most only make a token gesture for us, but she will not apply any sanctions against her customer—Red China.

If England takes that course in the vote today in the Security Council, it will be the best news the people of the United States have had since World War II came to an end. It means we can now look to our own security, without having to tail Great Britain up with money and men. It will remove the United States from any worry over Europe for the reason that to save England has always been our goal. What for, I do not know. This should end our preparations to establish an Army in Europe and cause a draft of 18-year-old boys. We have friends there, to be sure. Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Finland, but if we keep out of Europe, these countries will take care of themselves. The Germans do not want to fight and France could not fight if she wanted to, so with bankrupt England out of the picture, we should shout hallelujah—three cheers for the United States. It will save us a million men and two hundred billion in money. Of course, we cannot take too much credit for our sagacity, because it was the perfidy of the Attlee government that has brought this new hope and jubilation to the United States of America.

The English love to sing God Save the King, but I believe there are a few in the United States who would rather hear God save the United States.

It appears likely that the invaders will be driven out of South Korea and if that happens again, we should not pass beyond the thirty-eighth parallel. Hand the reins over to South Korea and call it a day in Korea. Our next move should be to withdraw from the United Nations and make no further attempts to obey the order of this body in taking on any more obligations to stop aggression anywhere in the world. We have seen how we have been treated by the United Nations and we should resolve right now that we will deal no further with an incompetent, unappreciative and intriguing body which will stifle all attempts at world peace in the future as it has in the past.

This supinely weak organization seems determined to let Red China enter the organization, and of course Red China will not contribute anything to world peace but will prevent it. With Russia, Red China, and back-sliding England in the United Nations, the people of the world should not repose the slightest faith in this organization.

England has rendered us a great service, in failing to support us. Their action has relieved us from a terrible obligation. The future will be interesting to watch as to England:

How long can she continue supporting her utopian ideas without our money? Can she support the peace of the world by taking Red China to her bosom? Can she retain the respect of honest men, while engaged in selling war materials paid for by this country to our enemies?

England has made a complete sucker out of this Nation—because there are many who can't imagine the human race would continue without Great Britain. She now wants to paddle her own canoe and for the love of Mike, let her do it.

OUR SO-CALLED POLICE ACTION

Mr. SHEEHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHEEHAN. Mr. Speaker, I have received a great deal of mail from my home district on the northwest side of Chicago. I spent the last week end at home, where I talked to many people, Republicans and Democrats. These good people, both by voice and by mail, are urging me to express to the Congress their views on this so-called police action and the foreign mess we are mired down in.

In the light of today's known facts the majority of my constituents want the following course of action:

First. Get out of Korea and quit "saving face" by losing lives.

Second. Send no more troops to Europe until Congress decides this matter under its constitutional powers.

Third. Build up and safeguard our own home defenses, giving serious consideration to ex-President Hoover's and Senator TAFT's recommendations.

Fourth. Give Europe only such material aid in the forms of arms and military equipment to defend themselves only if they are willing to work to protect their liberties and their homeland.

Fifth. Do not draft 18-year-old boys.

My conclusion is that the great mass of Midwest citizens know what they want. The only ones who seem to be lost, confused, and who do not know what they want are Secretary Acheson, President Truman, and their advisers.

PETITION TO THE CONGRESS AND THE PRESIDENT FROM ALABAMA

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with a request from my district, I went over to see President Truman yesterday to present to him a petition signed by approximately 12,000 people in the State of Alabama. Mr. J. Dozier P. Arnold, a Birmingham accountant, circulated this petition in Alabama and turned it over to me to present to the President and to the Congress. It reads as follows:

> We, the undersigned citizens and taxpayers of the United States, do petition you to stop immediately the unnecessary spending of our money for nonessential purposes and to devote all possible financial aid to the military.

Although the petition does not spell out specific places where savings can be made, the vast majority of Alabamians would say that the item in the budget allowing for FEPC operations is entirely unnecessary and harmful. The vast majority of the people in my district at least, which includes approximately 600,000 people, would say that the budget allowance for the Brannan farm plan and socialized medicine should also be eliminated. Everyone wants to avoid the recurrence of wasteful practices such as the potato subsidy and burning of good food. Most people want the enactment of certain additional Hoover Commission reports, which are designed to eliminate the overlapping of agencies and bring about greater efficiency in government.

I believe a select committee composed of outstanding Members of the House should be established for the duration of the crisis. This committee would help determine which activities and expenditures of the Government are essential to the national security. It would help find ways to operate our Government more efficiently and economically as well as to utilize manpower more effectively for the war effort.

Mr. Speaker, I know these petitioners are willing to assume increased taxes to carry on the defense activities but they want all wasteful, unessential, nonmilitary spending cut so the tax burden will not be heavier than necessary. They believe as I do that our resources must be used wisely to insure our victory.

We in the Congress must share the responsibility with the Executive in taking the necessary steps to achieve these goals.

ENLISTMENT OF FOREIGN NATIONALS IN THE ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, it has come to my attention that there are those who are under the impression that the legislation which I have proposed, to authorize the enlistment of foreign nations in the Army of the United States, is confined to nationals of Germany and Japan. Possibly I am somewhat at fault in connection with this misunderstanding. I have emphasized the enlistment of German and Japanese nationals because they represent the two largest pools of manpower available to us, and they are located at the two positions most important to our world-wide defense. However, the pending legislation specifically authorizes the enlistment of nationals of other countries—of all countries—of the Philippines, of Korea, of Mexico, Canada, and of all of the countries of Europe where there are men who want to enlist. It is simply an open invitation, such as the French have held out to foreigners to enlist in their Foreign Legion throughout all these years. The bill offers food, clothes, and pay to the unemployed but it also invites every friend of freedom, wherever he may be to join in the defense of a free world. I hope that everyone will understand I am not confining this invitation to any one group or nationality.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

DO NOT ADMIT CHINESE COMMUNIST GOVERNMENT TO THE UNITED NATIONS

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, last Friday, the gentleman from Massachusetts, our distinguished majority leader [Mr. MCCORMACK], and the gentleman from Massachusetts, the distinguished minority leader [Mr. MARTIN], jointly sponsored a resolution in this House which was adopted stating that it was the sense of the House of Representatives of the United States that the United Nations should declare Communist China the aggressor in Korea. I am glad to see that the United States Senate yesterday concurred in that action, and even went a step further, in which they declared it was the sense of that body that the Chinese Communist Government should not be admitted to the United Nations.

I am today introducing a similar resolution that it may be the sense of the House of Representatives that the Chinese Communist Government should not be admitted as members of the United Nations to represent China. I understand the Committee on Foreign Affairs is now organized, and I hope and believe, after talking with several members of that committee and others in the House, that we may get immediate action on this resolution. It is long past time for definite decision. Among others with whom I have talked to in this House are the leadership. They, too, have indicated their approval.

It is incredible to even think of admitting the Chinese Communists, as it appears that some UN members would, as the representative of China while at the same time they are aggressors in Korea.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

THE TASK THAT CONFRONTS US

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, shortly General Eisenhower will be back to advise us about certain matters, and undoubtedly most of us have some idea as to what he will say. If it is not presumptuous, may I suggest my colleagues read two books. One of them will give you an idea of the general himself. It is entitled "Eisenhower Was My Boss." The other is one written by the general himself, Crusade in Europe. If you will read this book—I just finished reading it the second time last night—you will get some idea of the magnitude of the task that confronted the general in World War II when Russia and the Communists were fighting on our side. If you will read those books you will get some idea of the general and the vital importance and the magnitude of the task which confronts us when Russia and Chinese Communists are our enemies, Japan and Germany unable to give very effective help, Britain and France lukewarm in their support.

SPREADING DEFENSE ORDERS

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] made a very pertinent observation here on the floor the other day when she said that it was a dangerous thing to concentrate industry in four major parts of the country. I have today introduced a bill which I believe will give all sections of the country a fair share of the defense orders. If Russia has the atomic bomb, there is only one thing that we can do, and that is to disperse and to deconcentrate industry so that every city in the country has a chance to get its fair share of defense orders. I believe that with our communication system we can do this.

We can fan out from industrial centers, into nearby villages, into surrounding territory, placing defense orders wherever competent and experienced hands are now in business.

This method of dispersal and distribution of our productive facilities will assure us of two things.

First, if we are attacked from the air, enemy planes will have a lot more territory to cover to bomb us, and even then, they cannot hope to cripple us because we will be too scattered.

Next, we will be able to sustain such attack indefinitely because our plants will be spread out so that only a few could possibly be hit during the same raid.

The bill reads as follows:

A bill to guarantee all existing industrial centers in the United States a fair share of defense industry

Be it enacted, etc., The Secretary of Defense is hereby directed to supervise the awarding of defense orders on the basis of relatively equal distribution by—

(1) Utilizing all existing industrial facilities now available for conversion to defense productions;

(2) Carefully selecting plants as contractors and subcontractors with a view to spreading defense work throughout every city and locality now established for manufacturing;

(3) Making use of all possible means of transport and communication in order to disperse defense orders as remote as possible from danger areas anticipating atomic bomb attacks;

(4) Analyzing the size and population of every city and area in order to determine the amounts of defense production such locality is capable of turning out and then placing orders as nearly as possible in line with this survey.

VETERANS' HOSPITALS

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I have asked this time for the purpose of advising my colleagues of the deplorable situation that is developing in the veterans' hospitals of our Nation.

In our zeal to get ready to win a third world war we are on the verge of making the 100,000 or more disabled and otherwise ailing veterans of World Wars I and II the forgotten men of the country.

The situation is this, Mr. Speaker: Of the 140 veterans' hospitals in operation at the present time there is a shortage of 384 members of the medical staff. There are six hospitals completed that have no medical staff at all and cannot be opened for the benefit of the veterans. During the calendar year 1951, 26 more hospitals will be ready for opening, requiring an additional 460 doctors. The situation is further confused by the calling up of reserves who are members of the staffs of these hospitals. Already 119 doctors and 294 trainee doctors have been called and separated from the hospitals. Another call is in for 384 more.

I want to make the prediction that unless something is done in the draft legislation that is about to be considered by the House to exempt doctors who are on the staff of veterans' hospitals more veterans' hospitals will be closed by the end of this year.

SPECIAL ORDER TRANSFERRED

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Speaker, I have a special order for Thursday of this week. Due to a death message received this morning, I ask unanimous consent that the order may be carried over until Monday of next week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

PROGRAM FOR BALANCE OF THIS WEEK

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, can the majority leader tell us the program for the rest of this week?

Mr. McCORMACK. After the disposition of these bills there is no further legislation that I know of. It is my intention after we dispose of these bills to adjourn until tomorrow and then go over until Monday.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I thank the gentleman; that is the information I wanted.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JONES of Alabama asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances, and to include in one a news article and in the other an editorial.

Mr. BRYSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a newspaper article.

Mr. ASPINALL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a letter.

Mr. BARTLETT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a letter.

Mr. DOLLIVER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include some facts about Iowa from the Iowa Development Commission.

Mr. VURSELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a letter by the farm editor for the St. Paul Pioneer Press Dispatch, in which the editor fully answers the misleading allegations in the press that the farmers are responsible for the rise in the cost of living.

Mr. WHARTON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial.

Mr. JENKINS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and include some editorial comments.

Mr. KEATING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial.

Mr. BLACKNEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article from the Michigan Times.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include several editorials.

Mr. MULTER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in three instances, and in each to include extraneous matter.

Mr. RANKIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.

Mr. KEARNEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article.

Mr. McCORMACK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article.

SERVICEMEN'S INDEMNITY ACT OF 1951

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 83 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to authorize the payment by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs of a gratuitous indemnity to survivors of members of the Armed Forces who die in active service, and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] if he desires any time on the rule?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. No. There is no objection to the adoption of the rule.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, this is a rule for the consideration of H. R. 1, which is a bill to give a certain amount of gratuitous insurance to members of the armed services when in combat in time of war emergency. Two hours general debate are provided, it waives points of order, and contains the usual provision for one motion to recommit.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AIR FORCE ORGANIZATION ACT OF 1951

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 88 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1726) to provide for the organization of the Air Force and the Department of the Air Force, and for other purposes. That after general debate which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Armed Services, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, this rule provides for the consideration of the bill H. R. 1726 to provide for the organization of the Air Force and the Department of the Air Force, and for other purposes, reported by the Armed Services Committee. I understand there is no opposition to it and that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] does not desire any time.

In view of that fact and knowing that the chairman of that great committee will explain the bill more thoroughly than I am in position to do, I shall not take any time. However, I do at this time yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to make an announcement to the House for the benefit of the Members.

We are all aware that next week, as I stated heretofore on the floor, and it also appeared in the press, General Eisenhower will address an informal joint meeting of the two branches of Congress in the Congressional Library. The date has not been stated heretofore. I desire to announce to the House that that informal joint meeting will take place in the Coolidge Auditorium, Library of Congress, at 10:30 a. m., February 1, 1951, which is a week from tomorrow; that there will be no tickets issued to Members of either branch. They will be admitted upon recognition. The press will be assigned seats in the front row in the extreme right and the extreme left of the auditorium.

I desire to make this announcement, knowing of the great interest in the matter, so that the Members might be advised as far in advance as possible as to the time when the informal joint meeting will take place.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce, and calls the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to this fact, that there are only 510 seats in that auditorium and it will not be possible for Members of the House or the Senate to have any guests on that occasion.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Illinois does not wish any time on the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. There is no objection to the adoption of the rule, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SABATH. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SERVICEMEN'S INDEMNITY ACT OF 1951

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to authorize the payment by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs of a gratuitous indemnity to survivors of members of the Armed Forces who die in active service, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H. R. 1, with Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

(Mr. RANKIN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides a gratuitous indemnity in the amount of $10,000 to the survivors of all men who lose their lives in the Armed Forces on and after June 27, 1950, without cost to the serviceman.

In addition, the man, upon discharge, will be protected for a period of 90 days in order to permit him to readjust to civilian life and determine the sort of insurance protection he wishes to obtain from commercial sources.

Beneficiaries are limited to the immediate family of the serviceman and the indemnity is payable only in monthly installments of $92.90 over a 10-year period.

Veterans having World War I and World War II insurance may maintain such insurance if they are recalled to active duty or they may avail themselves of the gratuitous indemnity. For those having permanent type of insurance, provision is made that they may surrender the policies for cash and reinstate them at some future date with a net saving to the individual. Holders of term policies who permit their policies to lapse during service may reinstate them after discharge.

Veterans of World War I and World War II who have Government insurance may continue their insurance, and this bill does not cancel, or restrict, or in any way adversely affect any rights which the veteran has under the terms of his existing insurance contract.

The gratuity is exempt from the claims of creditors and from taxation.

Any man unable to obtain commercial insurance after discharge at standard rates because of service-connected disability, will be eligible to carry a national service life insurance policy. In addition, a man having total service-connected disability will have his premiums waived. Veterans with disability may apply for this type of insurance at any time after discharge.

The bill carries out the budget recommendation. The Bureau of the Budget has indicated that it favors the approach embodied in this bill and gives as its opinion that, had it been in effect, several hundreds of millions of dollars would have been saved during the period 1940–49. The Comptroller General estimates that the saving would have amounted to $587,000,000.

The bill was reported unanimously by the committee and is substantially the same as H. R. 9911 which passed the House unanimously on December 18, 1950.

BACKGROUND OF THE LEGISLATION

On May 10, 1950, the committee unanimously adopted this resolution:

The staff of the committee is directed, during the recess of the Congress, to consult with the Veterans' Administration, the Department of Defense, the General Accounting Office, the Bureau of the Budget, and any other interested Government agency, and the four service organizations chartered by the Congress, with a view to presenting to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs in the Eighty-second Congress recommendations for a new law providing insurance protection to members of the Armed Forces and veterans of such forces; the staff to utilize, to whatever extent practicable, previous surveys or investigations made of this subject.

That resolution was adopted after a subcommittee had held rather extensive hearings on amendments to the National Service Life Insurance Act.

As indicated, the resolution was adopted unanimously and was an effort by the committee to study the desirability of providing uniform coverage and protection for all members of the Armed Forces whether they are in the Army, Navy, Air Force, or Coast Guard. At the same time, it was the hope of the committee that such uniform coverage, if desirable and feasible, could be provided with a decreased cost of administration to the Government. Not only was it desirable in the opinion of the committee to decrease administrative costs, with a resulting saving to the Treasury, but also to provide a program in the future which would be much more workable and sharply reduce the amount of manpower necessary to operate it. In connection with this vital problem of manpower, the testimony in 1950 of the Veterans' Administration insurance administrator is pertinent and is worthy of mention here. He said:

In time of emergency, I think the manpower to operate an insurance system, projecting in the future, would probably not be available. I am thinking of an insurance system of this character—

He referred to national service life insurance—

I base that on the difficulties that we had in connection with the operation of the insurance program during the last war. Most of our difficulties, even carrying over up to today, were due to lack of personnel, space, and equipment. * * * It is likely to be worse and I do not think we ought to repeat the experience that we had in this last war.

A recent study by the General Accounting Office indicates that during the period 1940–49, the Veterans' Administration had to set up approximately 26,000,000 individual files based on that number of applications for insurance in varying amounts. Had the system embodied in this bill been in effect during that period, the total number of files which the Veterans' Administration would have had to establish with respect to an indemnity would have been reduced to 438,000, representing the total number of in-service deaths from October 1940 to December 31, 1949. This, it should be noted, would have resulted in a substantial reduction in the amount of administration actually required.

As a further indication of the administrative savings in time and money and simplicity of operation which can be expected to follow as a result of the enactment of this legislation, the committee has been informally advised that when this proposal is enacted, the Department of Defense will use the same beneficiary designation form for both the proposed indemnity and the 6-months' death gratuity. Thus, there will not be any additional paper work necessary on the part of the Department of Defense, and of course the Veterans' Administration will come into the indemnity picture only in the event of the death of the serviceman during a period of service or within 90 days thereafter.

In connection with the testimony of the Assistant Administrator on the subject of manpower, the scarcity of manpower is much more acute today than when this testimony was given some 9 months ago.

There is no doubt in the minds of the committee that unless the present insurance program is changed, great difficulty will be experienced in obtaining sufficient competent manpower to administer the present national service insurance program.

The Comptroller General has forcefully pointed out the manpower and operational savings which the enactment of this legislation will bring. In a formal report on this proposal he stated:

The major operational or manpower savings which would be achieved under these two bills include (1) the elimination of the need for establishing military insurance allotments in the Department of Defense for all future entrants into the Armed Forces; (2) the probability that a majority of the present members of the Armed Forces will discontinue their insurance allotments, thereby making it unnecessary to maintain a vast number of allotment accounts now maintained in the Department of Defense; (3) the elimination of the transmission from the Department of Defense to the Veterans' Administration of a great number of monthly insurance allotment advices; (4) the elimination of the need for a mountain of paper work in the form of applications, medical examinations and certificates, and so forth; (5) the elimination of the need for underwriting work in the Veterans' Administration for personnel in the services; and (6) the elimination of the need for establishing and maintaining individual premium record accounts in the Veterans' Administration for each insurance allotment and policy.

Enactment of this uniform indemnity coverage bill will remove what has been considered a basic inequity and inadequacy in the existing Government insurance program. Take, for example, the cases of Smith, Brown, and Jones. Smith, Brown, and Jones all were draftee privates in a combat outfit. Each was married and had two children. For reasons best known to themselves, Smith had no national service life insurance coverage; Brown had $5,000 term insurance; Jones had $10,000 term insurance. In the same combat engagement, while subject to the same war hazards, all three were killed. The United States—not national service life insurance—pays Brown's family $5,000, Jones' family $10,000, and Smith's family gets nothing. The money which Brown and Jones contributed in the form of premiums to the maintenance of this insurance will not be used to meet any part of either death claim—this by virtue of the fact that the Government under the present law properly bears the entire cost in cases of deaths traceable to the extra hazards of military service. The premiums which Brown and Jones contributed are considered to have been earned by reason of the concurrent normal risk involved. They remain in the national service life insurance fund, and, it has been forcefully argued, serve to enrich, in the form of dividends, the policyholders. Among other reasons, it is to correct conditions illustrated by this example that the committee reports this bill favorably. It is of the firm opinion that uniform benefits to all people in the service are highly desirable and where the deaths, as above, are of such character that the insurance benefit is entirely paid for by the Government, there is no logical reason why the dependents of Smith in the example above should be discriminated against because of his oversight or neglect in not applying for insurance.

So far, the Department of Defense has announced casualty figures totaling over 42,730 resulting from the fighting in Korea. Of this number 7,023 have been killed and 7,143 are missing. This bill provides uniform coverage for all men in the service, which is quite different from the situation prevailing today under national service life insurance. At the peak during World War II, 95 percent of the men in the Armed Forces had insurance coverage with policies averaging approximately $9,500, but on June 30, 1950, 18 percent of the men overseas, having dependents, did not have insurance, and 22 percent of those in the United States with dependents did not have insurance. Further, at that time, only 54 percent of those having insurance had the full $10,000 coverage. This bill protects the interests of all the dependents of all men in the service to a uniform degree, which the present program fails to do. The present emergency makes prompt action imperative.

Pursuant to the cited resolution, the committee staff immediately began a series of conferences with officials of the agencies and organizations concerned, which ultimately led to the publication of House Committee Print 299 of the Eighty-first Congress, containing insurance information pertinent to this discussion. In addition to the reports from the four Government agencies and four veterans' organizations, there is included in the publication pertinent excerpts from the so-called Hook Commission report and memoranda prepared by the National Service Life Insurance Committee of the Joint Army and Navy Personnel Board, which began its studies back in 1946. In addition, for ready reference the staff had digested each bill which had been introduced on the subject of insurance for servicemen for the period 1939–50.

After this material had been studied and conclusions drawn from recommendations contained therein, a series of conferences were started and several round-table discussions were had on the suggestions made by the agencies and veterans' organizations.

It soon developed that there were at least three avenues of approach to this problem. First was the proposal to provide a system of gratuitous insurance or gratuitous indemnity which would automatically indemnify any member of the Armed Forces against the loss of his life while in active service. Second, it was proposed that a system of group insurance be authorized requiring a nominal premium for the serviceman of approximately $2 or $3 a month with mandatory deductions from his monthly service pay. Third was the suggestion that substantial amendments be made to the present National Service Life Insurance Act to provide for the assumption of administrative costs by the policyholders with respect to new contracts; for the calculation of premiums on future policies on a more realistic mortality table, possibly the 1941 Commissioners Standard Ordinary Table; and at the same time for the adoption of an up-to-date annuity table for the calculation of annuities for beneficiaries under other than lump-sum settlements.

After these three avenues of approach had been carefully considered by officials of the Government agencies and veterans' organizations, legislation was introduced in the Eighty-first Congress to accomplish each of the proposals described above. A subcommittee was appointed to hold hearings on these bills, and testimony was received from the Veterans' Administration, the Bureau of the Budget, the General Accounting Office, the Department of Defense, the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Disabled American Veterans, and AMVETS. Officials of the commercial insurance companies and representatives of the life-insurance agents also made brief appearances and expressed their views of the approach which should be taken.

It became evident from the testimony during the 7 days of hearings that the Bureau of the Budget would favor a gratuitous indemnity program, as would the General Accounting Office. The Bureau of the Budget also suggested that a comprehensive study be undertaken to consider the possibilities of integration of the present veterans' compensation program into the social-security system.

On January 15, 1951, the President formally recommended the gratuitous approach in his budget message in which he stated:

> Government liabilities for life insurance programs for servicemen and veterans are mainly for the costs of administration and for payments on account of deaths traceable to the extra hazards of military service.
>
> In view of the Korean hostilities and the current enlargement of the Armed Forces, there is pressing need for new legislation to assure financial protection to the families of servicemen. The present national service life insurance program does not meet this need. Because it is optional, the protection is not carried by some servicemen and is held in less than adequate amounts by others. The system is complex and costly and absorbs excessive manpower, especially when the Armed Forces are large and manpower scarce.
> It would be more equitable, and over the last decade it would have been more economical, to provide a free and automatic $10,000 indemnity to the survivors of all who die while in military service, and to establish a special new system of voluntary insurance open only to veterans whose insurability at standard rates has been impaired by military service. I recommend that this Congress now enact such legislation and extend its benefits to the dependents of those servicemen who have died while on active duty since June 27, 1950, if they did not have a like amount of servicemen's insurance protection.

The Department of Defense advocated further study of the problem and expressed its opposition to any proposal which would in any way curtail or otherwise reduce the amount of the benefits now made available to survivors of the Armed Forces. In connection with the position of the Department of Defense, it is pertinent to point out that a Committee on National Service Life Insurance, within the Armed Forces which studied this problem for some months, came to the conclusion that—

> The basic idea of granting gratuitous insurance to all members of the Armed Forces is both sound and economical.

At the same time, the same group listed the following as among the basic objections against the present national service life insurance system:

> (1) It is inordinately expensive, particularly on a wartime basis, administratively, the more important costs being:
>
> (a) Obtaining the applications.
> (b) Servicing the insurance.
>
> (c) Registration and discontinuance of allotments.
>
> (d) Maintenance of allotment records in service departments, adjustments, correspondence, etc.
>
> (e) Payments of premiums by service departments to Veterans' Administration.
>
> (f) Establishment and maintenance of insurance records in Veterans' Administration, namely: Index, file jackets, establishment of premium accounts, examination and approval of applications, issuance of certificates.
>
> (g) Consideration of medical examinations to determine the insurability of applicants who have been in service more than 120 days.
>
> (h) Reinstatement of insurance.
>
> (i) Correspondence.
> (j) Conversion.
>
> (k) Change of beneficiary.
>
> (l) General Accounting Office, Treasury Department and Department of Justice—costs incidental to the handling of insurance matters.
> (m) Rental space required for storage of forms and materials.
>
> (n) Printing costs for forms, pamphlets, etc.
>
> (2) It is expensive in personnel costs to all of the services as well as the other agencies involved.
>
> (3) Emergency conditions bring additions to the armed services and the sale and administrative burden of national service life insurance to a simultaneous peak. Manpower is subjected to additional heavy drains at the very moment it is most precious.
>
> (4) The amount of a serviceman's insurance coverage is apt to reflect not his need, but rather his particular susceptibility to suasion and his degree of response to campaign pressure.
> (5) The enormous size of the physical task involved in establishing and maintaining complete insurance records for a modern war's millions of servicemen and its subsequent millions of veterans results in an incredible but utterly unavoidable mass of confusion and delay.

The Veterans' Administration maintained its well-known policy of neither recommending for or against any proposal.

However, in reporting on H. R. 1, the Veterans' Administration pointed out that—

> No doubt, enactment of the bill would provide automatic, gratuitous, life indemnity protection for all persons embraced by the bill and it would eliminate a great amount of administrative work which otherwise would be required under the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, if that program is continued. The proposed plan would guarantee maximum ($10,000) protection to all, which is favored by many as being a great improvement over the present system under which many servicemen do not apply for any insurance and, in many instances, for less than the maximum protection. The manpower savings which eventually would result from enactment of the bill, particularly in the event of an all-out emergency, would be very desirable.

In testifying on this proposal, the representative of the Veterans of Foreign Wars stated:

> We subscribe to the principle of indemnity insurance without premium payments or red tape and to making the coverage automatic on every man who goes into the armed services. We believe that a program of that kind is in keeping with the traditional functioning of our Government. National service life insurance, in its present form, the way it has been administered in the past, actually offers less protection to the serviceman, with tremendous administrative cost and red tape and the perpetuation of bureaucracy with all of the headaches attendant to the various cases of inequity that develop, and costs more money in the long run than would the indemnity form of free insurance for every serviceman.

The Disabled American Veterans' representative stated that his organization believes that—

> In time of a major national emergency, the present system would require an entirely disproportionate ratio of manpower to administer, as contrasted with a plan not requiring the payment of premiums, bookkeeping, filing, and so forth. It is impossible to estimate the economies, not only in money, but in man-hours as well that could be realized * * *. While this proposal is a departure from the recognized insurance programs of World War I and World War II, we are firmly convinced that it is a departure in the right direction, and that as our mobilization progresses, it will have a salutary effect on the efficiency and economy of administering insurance benefits for members of the Armed Forces.

The representative of AMVETS, in endorsing the bill and urging its passage, stated:

> We feel that servicemen would be better satisfied with a universal coverage. We feel that loved ones at home would be happier in the knowledge of certain security in the event of death of a serviceman. We feel that the country would save money and that the veterans' program as a whole would benefit by virtue of the fact that the people would know exactly what national benefits existed. Besides providing a universal coverage for all servicemen, equally important, it would provide to those men who had lost their insurability, a vehicle by which they might have insurance protection. We do, however, suggest that the new proposal offered can carry out the Nation's obligations to its servicemen and to the beneficiaries of these men. We believe this proposal can save the Government money and therefore urge its passage.

The American Legion proposed amendments to the National Service Life Insurance Act to provide certain coverage for persons who die, become totally disabled, or are captured after June 27, 1950, and within 120 days after such proposal's enactment. Its proposal is directed particularly to the Korea casualties and would provide gratuitous insurance in the amount of $10,000 for those who do not have that amount of insurance in force at the time of their death, disability, or capture during the stated period. In addition, it was proposed that the $10,000 amount be extended to cover the dependents of veterans of World War II who are presently limited to $5,000 gratuitous insurance. The American Legion urged that if the indemnity approach is adopted, provision be made for veterans to obtain national service life insurance after separation from service, whether disabled or not.

The National Association of Life Underwriters, representing the insurance agents, recommended the gratuitous indemnity and while the commercial insurance companies' representative was guarded in his advocacy of any program, it is safe to say that a large segment of the commercial insurance industry believes that a gratuitous approach would be advantageous to the serviceman and to the country.

After completion of 7 days of hearings which resulted in 463 pages of printed testimony, the subcommittee unanimously recommended to the full committee H. R. 9911, Eighty-first Congress, which was reported from the committee without a dissenting vote and passed the House unanimously on December 18, 1950.

The provisions of H. R. 1 are substantially identical with H. R. 9911 with respect to its major purposes, the changes involving chiefly matters of clarification and technical improvements.

EXPLANATION OF THE BILL BY SECTIONS

The bill, as reported to the House, contains two parts—part I is cited as the "Servicemen's Indemnity Act of 1951," and part II as the "Insurance Act of 1951."

SECTION 1

Section 1 states that part I may be cited as the Servicemen's Indemnity Act of 1951.

SECTION 2

Section 2 provides that on and after June 27, 1950, except as otherwise provided, any person in the active service of the Army, Navy, Air Force, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, or the Reserve components thereof, including the National Guard under the conditions hereinafter noted, shall be automatically insured, without cost to the person, against death in active service in the amount of $10,000. Also included in this coverage are cadets and midshipmen of the United States Military, Naval, and Coast Guard Academies, and commissioned officers of the Public Health Service and Coast and Geodetic Survey while engaged in specified types of duty. In addition, servicemen called for active service for a period exceeding 30 days will be covered after separation from the service for a short period of 90 days, so that they may have that time within which to adjust their affairs and still be protected while deciding upon the type of insurance protection they may wish to purchase from a commercial insurance company. This additional protection would not be available to a man who spends a few days each month in active-duty training as a part of some local Reserve unit.

The broad coverage of the bill would include aviation cadets who are taking training in that field in any one of the three services, as well as persons in the Reserve components, including the National Guard, while engaged in aerial flight in Government aircraft, regardless of the period of time involved in such duty, provided such flights are incident to their military or naval training. Members of the National Guard, except as noted above, are included only when they are called or ordered to active duty or active training duty for a period of 14 days or more. A man serving in the National Guard on maneuvers for 2 weeks during the summer, for example, would have the protection afforded by this legislation. On the other hand, it would not provide protection for members of the National Guard who are performing training duty in a drill hall once or twice a month. Neither would it give protection to a man injured when the Guard was acting as an agency of the State in quelling a riot or other disturbance. The committee has been advised that any such injuries are compensable under the laws of the individual States.

As amended by the committee, the indemnity would be extended as of June 27, 1950, to persons, including volunteers for enlistment and reservists called to active duty, who were or shall be provisionally accepted and directed or ordered to report to a place for final acceptance or for entry upon active duty and who died or shall die as the result of disability incurred while en route to such place. Similar coverage is extended to selectees who, in response to an order to report for induction and after reporting to a local draft board, died or dies as the result of disability incurred while en route from such draft board to a designated induction station. In all such cases, the death shall be deemed to have occurred in active service for the purpose of part I. This provision is similar to the coverage under Public Law No. 300, Seventy-eighth Congress, May 11, 1944, for veterans' compensation purposes.

It will be noted from this section, and it should be stressed, that this will give retroactively automatic protection to all men who have been in the service since the fighting in Korea started, and in the event of death in such service, will authorize payment to their beneficiaries of the $10,000 indemnity, subject to the provision that beneficiaries of those persons having other Government insurance in force at the time of death will receive the difference, if any, between the amount of such insurance and $10,000.

SECTION 3

Section 3 directs the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to pay the indemnity, upon certification of the death by the secretary of the service department concerned, to the surviving spouse, child or children, parent, brother, or sister of the insured. This, it will be seen, limits the beneficiaries to the survivors in the immediate family of the insured. Beneficiaries within these classes may be named by the insured. If the designated beneficiary or beneficiaries do not survive the insured, or if none has been designated, the indemnity is payable to the first eligible class of beneficiaries according to the order set forth above, and in equal shares if the class is composed of more than one person. Any installments not paid to a beneficiary during such beneficiary's lifetime are payable to the named contingent beneficiary, if any; otherwise, to the beneficiary or beneficiaries within the permitted class next entitled to priority.

SECTION 4

Section 4: The indemnity is payable in equal monthly installments of 120 in number, with interest at the rate of 2¼ percent per annum. The committee is advised that this will amount to $92.90 per month for a 10-year period in cases in which the maximum indemnity is payable.

In the insurance programs applicable to World War I and World War II veterans, provision is made for options to be selected either by the insured or at the election of the beneficiary. In restricting the indemnity payments to equal monthly installments over a 10-year period, the committee is endeavoring to simplify administration and at the same time to assure a substantial monthly payment for a reasonable period of time. This will provide a larger sum than the monthly annuity payments under the existing Government insurance programs for widows with children during the time when a larger income will be most needed. It has not been the policy of the Congress at any time to permit lump-sum settlement of gratuitous insurance.

SECTION 5

Section 5 limits the total liability of the Government to $10,000 in any case where an indemnified person also has Government insurance in force. Thus, if a man in the service had $5,000 of national service life insurance in force at the time of his death on or after June 27, 1950, the beneficiary would receive $5,000 national service life insurance and $5,000 gratuitous indemnity.

Provision is made that any person in the active service who has national service life insurance or United States Government life insurance on a permanent plan in force may surrender such policy and receive its cash surrender value. Within 90 days after separation from active service, and without medical examination, he may upon written application be granted permanent type insurance on the same plan but not in excess of the amount surrendered, or he may reinstate such surrendered insurance upon payment of the required reserve and the premium for the current month. This provision was included in consideration of those recalled to active duty who have Government insurance on a permanent plan which they may not wish to abandon permanently but at the same time desire to be eligible for the full free indemnity while in the active service. The committee is advised that by reinstating the insurance, repayment of the cash surrender value and payment of the reserve for the time spent in the service, the policyholder would enjoy a net saving of the difference between the aggregate amount of premiums he would have paid and the reserve required to reinstate his policy.

While no rights of reinstatement under existing contracts of insurance will be impaired or denied by reason of enactment of the bill, the National Service Life Insurance Act and regulations issued thereunder provide presently that insurance surrendered for cash may not be reinstated nor may the person in such case be granted new insurance in any amount in excess of the difference between the amount of insurance surrendered and $10,000. Accordingly, section 5 is designed, among other things, to preserve the right of those who surrender their policy for cash to continue their insurance upon separation from service.

Rights under existing 5-year level premium term insurance policies of reinstatement, conversion, or renewal are likewise not impaired by the provisions of the bill. However, the committee realizes that in certain instances the 5-year term period will expire while insureds are in the active service and under conditions which would make it difficult or impossible for them to reinstate, renew, or convert their insurance prior to the expiration of the term. In order to preserve rights of policyholders in such cases, the bill has been amended to provide that any person in the active service having United States Government life insurance or national service life insurance on the 5-year level premium term plan, the term of which expires while such person is in active service after the date of its enactment, shall, upon application made within 90 days after separation from service, payment of premiums and evidence of good health satisfactory to the Administrator, be granted an equivalent amount of insurance on the 5-year level premium term plan at the premium rate for his then attained age.

SECTION 6

Section 6 authorizes the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to promulgate such rules and regulations as may be necessary or appropriate to carry out the purposes of part I. He presently has such authority under the National Service Life Insurance Act with reference to the amendments of that act proposed under part II of the bill.

SECTION 7

Section 7 authorizes appropriations for the payment of liabilities under the Servicemen's Indemnity Act of 1951.

SECTION 8

Section 8 provides that any person guilty of mutiny, treason, spying, or desertion, or who, because of conscientious objections refuses to perform service in the land or naval forces of the United States, shall forfeit all rights to an indemnity under the act; also, that no benefit shall be payable for death inflicted as a lawful punishment, except when inflicted by an enemy of the United States. However, the section contains a proviso which makes it clear that restoration to active duty after commission of any such offense shall restore all rights to an indemnity.

SECTION 9

Section 9 makes applicable to part I the provisions of Public Laws 262 and 844 of the Seventy-fourth Congress, as amended, which, among other things, would exempt the indemnity from taxation and claims of creditors; provide for the payment of benefits to minors and incompetents, with or without guardians; and regulate the recognition and fees of attorneys and agents. Provision is also made in this section that all or any part of the beneficiary's interest may be assigned to any person in the permitted classes when all other such persons join in the assignment.

SECTION 10

This section and sections 11 and 12 comprise part II of the bill. Section 10 adds two new sections, 619 and 620, to the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended. These new sections would prohibit issue of United States Government life insurance or national service life insurance to any person after its enactment except former insureds under the mentioned permanent plans of insurance surrendered for cash and except those released from active service under other than dishonorable conditions who are found by the Administrator to be suffering from a disability or disabilities for which compensation would be payable if 10 percent or more in degree and which renders such persons uninsurable at standard rates for ordinary life insurance. Such insurance would be issued on a nonparticipating basis and all premiums and other collections therefor and premiums and other collections hereafter received on nonparticipating insurance issued under other provisions of the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, would be credited directly to a revolving fund in the Treasury of the United States and any payments on such insurance would be made directly from such fund. A disability or disabilities for which compensation would be payable if 10 percent or more in degree would include those which are presumptively as well as those which are directly service-incurred.

Insurance provided under the new section 620 is similar to the so-called H insurance—or health insurance—previously granted to certain World War II veterans under the National Service Life Insurance Act who were unable to meet the health requirements for issue or reinstatement of insurance. Such insurance will be issued on a nonparticipating basis with calculations based on the American experience table of mortality and interest at 3 percent per annum compounded annually, as provided in the basic act. This section provides that on and after the date of enactment all moneys collected under this provision will be credited directly to a revolving fund in the Treasury and claims paid from this fund. Under present provisions relating to H insurance, premium and other collections are placed in the National Service Life Insurance Act appropriation and payments are made from such appropriation. Prospectively, such collections and payments would also be made to and from the revolving fund. Upon recommendation of the Bureau of the Budget, and with the concurrence of the General Accounting Office, this provision as to a revolving fund was included, since it was indicated that it would be desirable from the standpoint of sound accounting procedure. It should be emphasized that the amended language with respect to a revolving fund is simply a change in accounting procedure and will not in any way affect the benefits to which a veteran is entitled.

Under the existing H insurance (as shown by letter dated January 11, 1951, from the Veterans' Administration, appended to this report), there has been collected through October 31, 1950, a net of $1,496,533.38 and at the same time $648,463 has been paid on claims made against this appropriation, leaving a balance of $848,070.38. Thus, it will be seen that this fund is at least currently in a highly solvent condition, despite the fact that the group concerned is composed of impaired risks.

Section 10 also provides that waiver of premiums under the National Service Life Insurance Act shall not be denied on the ground that total service-connected disability commenced prior to the effective date of the new H insurance herein authorized. Under this type of insurance 80 waivers of premium are presently in effect on 72 lives.

The committee is of the opinion that the premiums for this nonparticipating type of insurance will be more than sufficient to meet the claims which may arise on such insurance in the future. However, provision is made that should a deficit occur, an appropriation can be made to the fund.

In connection with the revolving fund, the committee believes that the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs at some future time may find it desirable to review the experience under this type of insurance to determine whether this type of insurance could be maintained on a self-sustaining basis at a reduced premium.

SECTION 11

Section 11 provides that nothing in the act shall be construed to cancel or restrict in any way any rights under insurance contracts issued on or prior to the date of its enactment. The committee has been advised that in the absence of this specific provision the language of the bill would not preclude renewal of term insurance, if otherwise authorized, or future reinstatement or conversion of policies which have lapsed before or after the enactment of the bill. Should the question arise as a result of improper interpretation by any Government agency, it is the opinion of the committee that the courts would sustain the position that contract rights cannot be affected by subsequent legislation. In any event, section 11 will remove any doubt as to such matters.

SECTION 12

Section 12 states that part II may be cited as the Insurance Act of 1951.

SUMMARY

Thus, it will be seen that this bill provides a maximum uniform coverage for all men who entered the Armed Forces after June 27, 1950, and who will enter in the future. To the extent that it supersedes Government life insurance, it should eliminate all of the administrative costs and manpower currently required to handle applications, premium collections, records, and accounts under the National Service Life Insurance Act. It provides the same treatment to all survivors of men killed in the service of their country and authorizes insurance protection after separation from service in all cases where service-connected disabilities have impaired insurability.

ESTIMATE OF COST

In view of a number of indeterminate factors involved, it is not possible to make an accurate estimate of the cost or savings which would be effected by the bill. However, it is manifest to your committee that its enactment, in lieu of the continuance of national service life insurance generally, will result in very substantial over-all savings to the Government. In this regard, the Comptroller General of the United States has estimated that had the indemnity program been in effect during the period from October 8, 1940, to June 30, 1949, in lieu of the national service life insurance program, the cost to the Government would have been reduced by approximately $587,000,000.

INSURANCE IN FORCE AT END OF FISCAL YEAR INDICATED

The amount of insurance in force in programs administered by the Veterans' Administration and the number of such policies is important to this discussion and I am giving this information for the record.

NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE COVERAGE, WORLD WAR II

In support of the national service life insurance program in World War II as against the provisions contained in House bill 1, Eighty-second Congress, it has been pointed out that as of June 1945, approximately 96 percent of all servicemen had insurance coverage averaging $9,500 per person. It is found, however, upon analysis of these figures that they do not give a true picture of the over-all situation as it existed from the beginning to the end of the shooting war.

For example, Army casualty reports as of November 27, 1942, show that 6 percent of the officers and 25 percent of the enlisted men killed in action were without insurance coverage. In another casualty report dated January 20, 1943, it was found that 13.79 percent of the officers and 20.05 percent of the enlisted men were without insurance. Two other reports, both dated April 5, 1943, from different theaters of war, established that all the officers had insurance coverage, but 27 percent of enlisted men were without insurance from one theater, and those with insurance coverage had policies averaging $5,833. In the other theater, 22 percent of the enlisted men had no coverage and those with coverage had policies averaging $7,000. Or, to put it another way, one of nine combat casualties had no life insurance whatsoever and for those covered, the average face value of policies issued from Pearl Harbor day to VJ-day was slightly over $7,000.

The following table shows the percentage of insurance coverage for all persons in the Army and Air Force from August 1942 through December 1945:

Month:	Percent
August 1942	63.6
December 1942	73.4
June 1943	75.7
December 1943	88.7
June 1944	92.8
December 1944	94.6
June 1945	95.6
December 1945	96.2

It was estimated that the ratio for the Navy and the Marine Corps would be approximately the same as for the Army.

PRESENT NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE COVERAGE

It should be pointed out that as of October 31, 1950, there were 5,682,470 national service life insurance policies in force. After making deductions for those now in service, it is estimated that approximately 4,000,000 or 1 in 6 World War II veterans now have national service life insurance coverage.

Based upon Veterans' Administration statistical reports, it has also been estimated that approximately 1 in 14 World War II veterans recalled to active service would have national service life insurance coverage on a permanent plan.

There are no accurate figures available showing the percentage of men now in service covered by national service life insurance or the average amount of insurance held by those who have coverage. However, as of June 30, 1950, a survey by the Army shows the following: that 18 percent of those with dependents serving overseas and 22 percent of those with dependents serving in the United States had no insurance protection. Of those having insurance protection, 54 percent with dependents serving overseas had the full $10,000 coverage and 50 percent of those in the United States had full $10,000 coverage. Thus, it can readily be seen that a rather high percentage of our Armed Forces have no insurance protection and that the average amount of coverage for those who do have insurance is well under $10,000.

EXAMPLE OF OPERATION AND SAVINGS UNDER SECTION 5 OF THE BILL H. R. 1

Section 5 of H. R. 1 provides several advantages to present holders of national service life insurance and I offer the following examples:

ORDINARY LIFE PLAN

If a veteran converted 5-year level premium term insurance at age 25 and paid premiums on $10,000 for a period of 5 years, his cash surrender value at the end of 5 years would be $457.60. After making a cash surrender and he desires to come back into the program at the end of 3 years, he would be required to pay back the $457.60 without interest plus $309.60 required reserve.

Had he stayed in the program, he would have paid $493.20 in premiums over a period of 3 years. By getting out of the program for a period of 3 years and then coming back into the program, he saves $183.60.

TWENTY-PAYMENT LIFE PLAN

Cash surrender value at end of 5 years amounts to $954.90. After taking the cash surrender and the veteran desires to come back into the program, he would be required to repay the $954.90 without interest plus $657.25 required for reserve.

Had he remained in the program, he would have paid $762.20 in premiums over a period of 3 years. By getting out for 3 years and coming back, he saves $106.

If the veteran takes the cash surrender value and decides after serving a period of 3 years that he prefers to take out a new policy at the then attained age, instead of repaying the cash surrender value and the required reserve, the rate follows:

Age 33, ordinary life monthly premiums per $10,000	$16.90
Age 25, ordinary life monthly premiums per $10,000	13.70
Difference	3.20
Age 33, 20-payment life, monthly premiums per $10,000	24.40
Age 25, 20-payment life, monthly premiums per $10,000	21.20
Difference	3.20

In order that the record may be complete on this proposal, I am inserting at this point the report of the Coast and Geodetic Survey on the provisions of H. R. 1:

COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THE SECRETARY OF COMMERCE,
Washington, January 22, 1951.

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN,
Chairman, Committee on Veterans' Affairs, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: There are attached in further reply to your request dated December 28, 1950, for a report with respect to H. R. 1, a bill to authorize the payment by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs of a gratuitous indemnity to survivors of members of the Armed Forces who die in active service, and for other purposes, the views of the Coast and Geodetic Survey thereon, and a letter from the Acting Assistant Director of the Bureau of the Budget with respect to the report of the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

If we can be of further assistance in this matter, please call on us.

Sincerely yours,

THOS. W. S. DAVIS,
Acting Secretary of Commerce.

JANUARY 22, 1951.

To: The Secretary of Commerce.
From: Director, Coast and Geodetic Survey.
Subject: H. R. 1.

This is in reply to your request for the views of the Coast and Geodetic Survey with respect to H. R. 1, a bill to authorize the payment by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs of a gratuitous indemnity to survivors of members of the Armed Forces who die in active service, and for other purposes.

The Coast and Geodetic Survey agrees with the underlying principle of the bill that the Government has a responsibility for indemnification for loss of life or disability suffered by members of the uniformed services while on active duty. Because of the small number of Coast and Geodetic Survey officers who will be affected by the bill, we do not believe that we are in a position to make recommendation regarding the plan best suited to meet this responsibility.

This bill provides a gratuitous indemnity to all members of the uniformed services while in active service except that commissioned officers of the Coast and Geodetic Survey and of the Public Health Service are covered only under certain limiting conditions. These limitations, as regards Coast and Geodetic Survey personnel, present difficult problems of administration and constitute an inequity in the case of officers who, because of their value elsewhere, do not happen to be assigned to duty in the specific areas mentioned.

The bill is in accord with the recommendations of the Hook Commission as regards gratuitous indemnity except for the definition of persons in service as set forth in section 2. The Department has previously endorsed the findings of the Hook Commission, that insurance, retirement, and other benefits should be considered a part of the total emolument of members of the uniformed services. The Commission's report included recommendations as to basic pay, allowances, retirement, and severance pay, as well as a gratuitous plan of insurance for all active-duty personnel in the uniformed services, including Coast and Geodetic Survey officers without limitation. The Career Compensation Act of 1949 was a result of this study and provides uniform pay, allowances, and disability retirement for all services. The limitation imposed in section 2 of the bill has the net effect of a reduction in pay. Furthermore, the person so excluded will be forced to buy commercial insurance to provide his dependents the same protection that is given to others free of charge.

Coast and Geodetic Survey officers are commissioned, paid, and retired under the same or similar legislation as that for the Navy. It is believed that the uniformity of emoluments should be continued into the insurance program.

At the time he accepts his commission, a Coast and Geodetic Survey officer voluntarily becomes a member of a corps from which the President, under the act of May 22, 1917, at his discretion and without the officer's consent, may transfer him to the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Air Force in time of war or national emergency.

Coast and Geodetic Survey officers lose insurability with commercial companies by reason of their occupation when—

(a) Ordered to duty in foreign countries.

(b) Ordered to duty which requires flights in a capacity other than regular fare-paying passengers in scheduled commercial airplanes.

(c) By virtue of the fact that they are subject to transfer to the Armed Forces, some insurance companies classify our officers as members of those forces or under orders for induction.

Approximately 5 percent of the corps has been or is now on foreign duty. Additional assignments of this type will probably be made in the near future.

Operations in Alaska have been expanded in recent years at the request of the Defense Department. The only available transportation in most of Alaska is the bush plane. Consequently, a large number of our officers are required to make flights which render them uninsurable except at high rates. Nor does this work entitle them to flight pay.

Furthermore, there is no provision of law, except under special conditions, which offers any continuing benefits to the dependents of deceased Coast and Geodetic Survey officers. The gratuity proposed in this bill is a survivor benefit which should accrue to the dependents of all uniformed service personnel without limitation because of rank or assignment of the person in service.

For these reasons it is recommended that the definition of "persons in service" be rewritten to conform with the language of the Career Compensation Act and include all members of all uniformed services while on active duty, and that the term "Armed Forces" be changed to read "uniformed services" wherever it appears in the bill.

If we can be of further assistance, please call upon us.

R. F. A. STUDDS,
Rear Admiral, United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, Director.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
BUREAU OF THE BUDGET,
January, 17 1951.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF COMMERCE.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: This is in reply to Mr. Davis' letter of January 15, 1951, enclosing four copies of a proposed report to the chairman of the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs on H. R. 1 and H. R. 3, bills to authorize payment by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs of a gratuitous indemnity to survivors of members of Armed Forces who die in active service, and for other purposes.

H. R. 1 and 3 would extend gratuitous indemnity protection to the Coast and Geodetic Survey employees under the same conditions as national service life insurance protection is extended by the provisions of section 2 of Public Law 786, Seventy-seventh Congress. While it is true that Public Law 786 provides eligibility only during "the period of the present war" World War II has not been terminated for purposes of this law. Commissioned officers of the Coast and Geodetic Survey are therefore eligible for national service life insurance and would be eligible for indemnity protection under H. R. 1 or 3 if serving outside the continental United States, in Alaska, or (under some circumstances) in the coastal waters of the United States.

Your report recommends that H. R. 1 and 3 be revised to extend their benefits to Coast and Geodetic Survey employees under any and all circumstances. This would mean that an agency which under ordinary circumstances has been considered a civilian agency would for the purposes of these bills be classified as a military agency. It is the view of the Bureau of the Budget that this would represent a basic change in the status of the Coast and Geodetic Survey and therefore should not be considered in the context of H. R. 1 or 3. Moreover, since World War II has not been terminated for the purposes of Public Law 786, Seventy-seventh Congress, it would seem unnecessary to consider such a basic change at this time.

Your attention is also called to the fact that certain of the Coast and Geodetic Survey employees eligible for survivor protection under H. R. 1 or 3, would also be eligible for survivor protection under the terms of the Federal Employees' Compensation Act 1916, as amended. Section 7 of this act provides that any individual entitled to receive gratuitous benefits under the Federal Employees' Compensation Act shall elect whether to receive such benefits or those provided under other provisions of law. There appears to be some doubt that the benefits provided by H. R. 1 and 3 would be covered by section 7. The Bureau of the Budget is, therefore, recommending that the language in H. R. 1 and 3 be clarified to eliminate any possibility of duplicate benefits in this respect.

While there is no objection to the submission of your report to the committee, it is requested that a copy of this letter be transmitted therewith for the committee's information.

Very truly yours,
DONALD B. MACPHAIL,
Acting Assistant Director, Legislative Reference.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ELLIOTT], a member of the subcommittee that held the hearings and reported the bill.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, as we apparently race headlong into another world war, due largely to conditions that we have no control over, it becomes necessary that we again look into the proposition of providing a system of insurance for the servicemen who are now being called in large numbers into the service. The system of national service life insurance which came into effect in October 1940 has been criticized very roundly by many people, by some veterans and some veterans' organizations. The Veterans' Administration, charged with the administration of that act, has been roundly criticized from time to time but I say to you as one who has tried to look into this proposition very carefully over a period of the last several months, as one who served on the subcommittee of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs of the House that held hearings and unanimously reported this bill, that I am convinced that the wonder of it is that the Veterans' Administration has been able to do as well in the administration of the national service life insurance system as they have been able to do. It is generally recognized among commercial insurance companies that a company can actually put insurance on the books too rapidly. They tell us that it costs about $1.10 to $1.15 for each first year premium dollar to put the business on the books. The national service life insurance necessarily has operated in such a way that, beginning in October 1940 with no policies, in a period of about 5 years it wrote some 16,000,000 policies on the servicemen of this country. Immediately following World War II it was faced with the proposition that those policies, along with the demobilization, were dropped very rapidly, with the result that today we have in force only about one out of six of those policies.

The Veterans' Administration has had to operate under extremely difficult conditions. The changing insurance picture, changing needs for personnel to administer the system, and all those things, have made it not only extremely difficult but extremely costly.

I was very much surprised to learn as a result of the hearings we held that if we had had the bill H. R. 1, which we propose here today, in force from October 1940 to June 30, 1949, we could have administered that law at a saving of about $600,000,000 over that period; in other words, had the bill we propose here today been in effect we would have realized a net saving in the cost of administration of approximately $65,222,000 per year.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I am glad to hear the gentleman make that statement, as it bears me out in my efforts in February 1942 to do this very thing. In other words, had the Congress at that time accepted my bill, H. R. 6512, which appears in the RECORD of June 8, 1942, on page 5029, and which was introduced in February of that year, instead of ruling it arbitrarily out of order when it was offered as an amendment to another bill on that day, the taxpayers of this Nation would have been ahead an additional $600,000,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

The administrative problems connected with national service life insurance were so complicated and so heavy during the years we have mentioned that last year the Assistant Administrator for Insurance of the Veterans' Administration declared before the Porter-Hardy subcommittee that it was doubtful whether the system could go through another national emergency and could provide itself with the trained manpower that would be needed to operate the system. Of course, in peacetime, the manpower problem would not be difficult to solve, in itself, if no consideration is given to the cost factors involved. It is in time of national emergencies, in time of world wars that we are faced with the urgent necessity of conserving manpower, man-days and even man-hours.

Since the Assistant Administrator for Insurance made his statement, as we know, an emergency has developed and it now behooves us, as I see it, to try to work out some system which will be practical and will avoid the extreme costs of the present system, costs both in terms of manpower and in terms of dollars.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. POTTER. Was any effort made by your subcommittee to find out whether private insurance companies could take over the contracts which the Veterans' Administration now has with the veterans to provide them that insurance? In other words, I am reluctant to see the Federal Government engaging in insurance business or any other business unless it is absolutely necessary. And I am wondering if your subcommittee went into that field to see if the private companies would not take those contracts without having these costs to the veterans as the situation now is.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I will say to the gentleman a representative of the commercial companies advised privately that the large insurance companies have considered such a proposal and found it not to be feasible. I am inclined to think that with the shifting situation which exists in connection with the national service life insurance it would be impossible or practically impossible for present contracts to be taken over. I think if we are to improve the system, the improvements will have to be made from here on out, rather than to improve anything that has occurred in the past. Of course we all realize that nothing can be done, and I think there is no desire on the part of anyone, and certainly not on my part to do anything which would in anywise impair any contract of national service life insurance which is outstanding at the present time.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the chairman of the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs, the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me say to the gentleman from Michigan, that the insurance companies said they would not and could not take up the existing policies.

Mr. POTTER. I thank the gentleman for that information.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Should this bill become law, does it mean that the Government eventually will get out of the life insurance business?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes; the Government will largely get out of the life insurance business, but will not get out of that phase which is provided for in this bill where in the event a veteran is unable to procure life insurance, within 90 days after he has finished his service, at standard rates from commercial companies, then he is entitled to continue his insurance under the terms and provisions of this bill under what is commonly known as H insurance or health insurance under the National Service Life Insurance System.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Is it to be assumed the veteran who cannot buy standard life insurance 90 days after his discharge from the service was not disabled while in the service?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Any veteran who dies within 90 days after discharge is covered by this bill no matter what the cause of his death. After that, at any time a veteran develops a service-connected disability and is uninsurable by commercial standards he may get insurance.

Mr. GOLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. GOLDEN. Is there any provision providing for the reinstatement of a policy which might have lapsed? I am thinking of the veteran who may let his insurance lapse. Could he be reinstated in any way under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. ELLIOTT. There is nothing in this bill which would impair the present right of reinstatement that goes along with every contract of insurance issued under the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended. It is the same right as exists today for reinstatement or conversion.

Mr. GOLDEN. How long would that exist? How much time is given for him to reinstate his insurance?

Mr. ELLIOTT. As the law now stands he could reinstate it or convert a permanent policy at any time, under certain conditions, as long as he lives. In the case of term insurance the reinstatement must be made before the term expires—that is the law today in which we are making no change. The Congress must continue to extend the 5-year level term premium plan under which these policies are presently being operated for this to be true.

Mr. GOLDEN. Does that only apply to the 5-year term insurance policies in force, or does it extend to those veterans who have let their policies lapse, who have a certain period of time in which they could reinstate them?

Mr. ELLIOTT. They could reinstate them in accordance with the provisions of the contract which lapsed, regardless of the type of national service life insurance contract which lapsed.

Mr. GOLDEN. There is no provision in this act which violates any of the rights of a veteran under the contracts they may have, is that correct?

Mr. ELLIOTT. The gentleman is exactly right, and to be absolutely sure about that, we wrote in section 11, from which I quote:

> Nothing contained in part I or part II of this act shall be construed to cancel or restrict any rights under insurance contracts issued on or prior to the date of its enactment.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. FORD. In answer to the inquiry by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, you said that if a veteran could not get private insurance coverage within 90 days at standard rates, that was an inference that he had a service-connected or non-service-connected military disability. Does the gentleman from Alabama mean to infer that that turn-down would be prima facie evidence which could be used in the veterans' application for a disability pension? I do not think you intended to go quite that far.

Mr. ELLIOTT. No; I did not. And in clarification of the gentleman's question, I want to read from section 620 of the act:

> SEC. 620. Any person who is released from active service under other than dishonorable conditions on or after the date of enactment of the Insurance Act of 1951, and is found by the Administrator to be suffering from a disability or disabilities for which compensation would be payable if 10 percent or more in degree which renders such person uninsurable at standard rates for ordinary life insurance, according to recognized underwriting requirements of nongovernmental insurers, shall, upon application in writing and payment of premiums as provided in this act, be granted insurance by the United States against the death of such person occurring while such insurance is in force.

Mr. FORD. In other words, if he qualifies in that respect, then he is eligible for this insurance, for those who cannot get coverage under commercial policies?

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is true.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Is it not true the veteran must have a service-connected disability before he is eligible to extend his insurance?

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is right, although that service-connected disability need not necessarily be 10 percent in degree, that it need not be sufficient in degree to entitle him to compensation benefits under the compensation laws.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. FORD. Is the 90-day period ample for veterans to apply for this kind of insurance if they cannot get commercial policies?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I am inclined to think that 90 days might be sufficient.

However, under the bill as reported by the committee, the veteran may obtain insurance at any time he can show he has a service-connected disability which makes him uninsurable at standard rates by commercial companies.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. POTTER. Did I understand you to say that the veteran has a right to reinstate his present policy or former policy? In other words, I want to know what would happen to a veteran who had a policy and whose policy lapsed and then H. R. 1 becomes law. Would he have a right then to reinstate his former policy?

Mr. ELLIOTT. He certainly would, in complete accordance with the terms and conditions of the contract between him and the national service life-insurance system under the policy which he allowed to lapse or dropped.

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. BONNER. As I understand the gentleman, nothing in this act affects the World War I policy that is now in effect and has been paid up.

Mr. ELLIOTT. The gentleman is entirely correct.

Mr. BONNER. All of the benefits that are guaranteed under that contract continue?

Mr. ELLIOTT. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BONNER. And adjudication of the policy will be carried out by the Veterans' Administration, and no other agency?

Mr. ELLIOTT. The gentleman is correct. Likewise, the same is true with respect to policies of national service life insurance issued to veterans of World War II. There is nothing in this act whatsoever that impairs any right which any policyholder now has.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ELLIOTT] has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. EVINS. I think the gentleman should point out that while there is nothing in this legislation which would impair the right of contract with veterans of World War I and World War II, if part II of the bill is adopted there will be no further issuance of national service life insurance to future veterans.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Except those who are disabled, in accordance with the provision that I have mentioned.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to ask the distinguished gentleman from Alabama if any thought was given in the preparation of this legislation to the terms of the new selective or universal military training bill that is now up for consideration by the Armed Services Committee of the House and the Senate? In other words, the thought I am trying to get across is that after their term of 21 months' or 27 months' training they can still be held in the Reserves for another 7 years, making the man available for approximately 10 years. Is there anything in this legislation that when a man comes out of his 27 months' or 21 months' training and his policy is automatically canceled, to continue it while he was in the Reserves?

Mr. ELLIOTT. He would be automatically covered on return to active military service.

Mr. BAILEY. I think we ought to take that into consideration in drafting this legislation. We ought to know what we are running into in this new selective-service requirement.

Mr. ELLIOTT. It seems to me that we solve this problem when we provide coverage for everybody in the armed services.

Mr. BAILEY. I am talking about the Reserves.

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. KEARNEY. I may say to the gentleman from West Virginia that there was not any contemplated plan for taking care of the Reserves or the National Guard unless the Reserves or the National Guard were called into active service. It does not make any difference how long they are in active service, whether it be a day or a year they are covered while they are on active duty even after they serve their 27 months or whatever length of time it is.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. Would they at the expiration of their 27 months of service, or 21 months, as the case may be, cancel that policy and then when he was called from the Reserves back into active duty write a new policy for him?

Mr. ELLIOTT. It would not be necessary to write a policy at all. When the soldier left the service his coverage would expire in 90 days. If he were recalled his $10,000 coverage would be automatically reinstated.

Mr. BAILEY. Here is another thing to consider: A man goes into active service at the age of 21 and serves his 21 or 27 months and he serves so long in the Reserves, 6, 8, or 10 years. He is that much older than he was when he entered the service, and the rate of commercial insurance on him would have doubled what it was at age 21. That is another thing that ought to be considered.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. It is my understanding the person while on active duty is automatically covered under the provisions of this bill. Is that right?

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is right.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. When he is released to inactive duty the policy terminates, but if he is called back to active duty the policy is revived.

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is right.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Is it not a fact that this bill represents a fundamental change in the matter of the type of insurance provided? You are going to give all indemnity against the hazards of being in the armed services, not as a perquisite such as we gave them in World War II but on a very much different basis.

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is right.

Mr. JAVITS. While I am not saying we do not have the right to change the policy, yet I say that if we do change it we ought to be clear so that there can be no question left that this is a fundamental change of policy; this is no longer a perquisite that is given to the men for serving in the Armed Forces.

Mr. RANKIN. The coverage is very much broadened and includes the ones who could not take out insurance, men who never had been insured before.

Mr. JAVITS. I am not arguing on the merits of the legislation; I am only pointing out that this does represent a fundamental change in policy.

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is right. Under the policy in effect in World War II we never were able to get universal coverage of all the people brought into the Armed Forces. As a matter of fact, after spending years trying to sell insurance to the members of the Armed Forces—and every single unit in the military forces, so far as I know, had at least one officer who was designated as insurance officer as an additional duty, we never did achieve universal coverage. Try hard as we did, we were unable to get more than 95 percent coverage; and that came only in December of 1945.

Mr. CLEMENTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield.

Mr. CLEMENTE. The gentleman said that if a man were recalled to active duty he would be covered by this insurance.

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is right; if he is a National Guard man and is recalled for a period of 14 days or longer or a member of the Organized Reserves and is recalled for a period of 30 days or longer, he is covered; and, in addition, he is covered on any military flights in Government planes.

Mr. CLEMENTE. If the reserve converted his insurance to what extent are they covered during the period of suspension, during inactive service? If he converted his insurance to endowment payments or annuity payments and came back to service would he still be covered?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I am not sure I understand the gentleman's question but I want to make this statement as a matter of clarification. Any person on and after June 27, 1950, who enters the armed services is covered by this automatic $10,000 indemnity. If he has national service life insurance on the 5-year level term premium plan, he can lapse that and take advantage of the indemnity provided by this act. When his service is over he may renew his national service life insurance coverage. The same thing is true with people who have converted their policies. In addition, it permits a conversion principle which I will try to find here and read to the gentleman right now.

Section 5 provides:

The automatic indemnity coverage authorized by section 2 shall apply to any person in the active service of the named Armed Forces who, upon death in such active service, or within 90 days after separation or release from such active service as prescribed in section 2, is insured against such death under a contract of national service life insurance or United States Government life insurance.

Any person in active service, who is insured under a permanent plan of national service life insurance or United States Government life insurance, may elect to surrender such contract for its cash value. In any such case the person, upon application in writing made within 90 days after separation from active service, may be granted, without medical examination, permanent plan insurance on the same plan not in excess of the amount surrendered for cash, or may reinstate such surrendered insurance upon payment of the required reserve and the premium for the current month.

Mr. CLEMENTE. When he is recalled to active duty and has a converted insurance plan, can he continue his insurance?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Absolutely.

Mr. CLEMENTE. And not take this insurance policy at all?

Mr. ELLIOTT. He may completely ignore the plan set forth in H. R. 1 if he deems that to be to his best interest.

Mr. CLEMENTE. A young boy 21 years of age is in the service and is covered by this insurance. His civilian rate at that time would be five-dollars-and-something a month. Suppose he decided he did not want your insurance and wanted to buy it himself so that when he completed his service he would be able to convert his insurance. Could he do that under this bill?

Mr. ELLIOTT. No; this bill does not provide for those people coming into the Armed Forces since June 27, 1950, any insurance after the expiration of 90 days after discharge from the service, except for those so disabled by their service that they cannot obtain commercial insurance at standard rates.

Mr. CLEMENTE. The point is whether he could buy his own insurance now as he enters the service.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Does the gentleman mean from commercial companies?

Mr. CLEMENTE. No; from the VA under the National Service Life Insurance Company.

Mr. ELLIOTT. No, he cannot.

Mr. CLEMENTE. In other words, we are cutting off this right; this bill cuts off that right?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. This bill gives him automatic insurance to the amount of $10,000, which is the limit under any consideration.

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is right. This bill, of course, gives absolutely free to every person who enters the armed services $10,000 of coverage. It gives it to him free rather than charge him $6 or $7 per month as is true under the present system. In addition to that, it has the effect of saving thousands of employees in the Veterans' Administration, and it saves probably fifty to sixty million dollars per year in administrative cost.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Let us consider the case of a former serviceman who holds, we will say, insurance from World War I and he is called back to active duty for the present emergency. He elects to retain his present World War I insurance. Who will pay the premiums?

Mr. ELLIOTT. He will pay the premiums.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. He will pay the premiums?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. If he pays the premiums on his World War I insurance, will he still be covered by the $10,000 gratuitous insurance policy for the present emergency?

Mr. ELLIOTT. He will not.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. He cannot have both?

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is right.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. ALBERT. What about the case of the presently existing term insurance held by veterans of the last war?

Mr. ELLIOTT. They can continue that insurance if they desire to do so, or they can drop it and be covered by the automatic coverage provided by this act; then reinstate 90 days after their discharge from the service.

Mr. ALBERT. I know, but those that do not go back into the service, does this affect their term insurance?

Mr. ELLIOTT. This does not affect them in any manner or means whatsoever.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is in a position to advise the Members of the House as to the comparative premium rates on policies under this act as compared to the policies under the Veterans' Administration as they are administering it at the present time. What is the premium rate? The statement was made by the chairman of the committee that had it been in operation since 1940 it would have saved $587,000,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is the testimony of the General Accounting Office.

Mr. BAILEY. That leads me to the assumption that the rates under this bill are going to be considerably lower than the rates that the veteran would have to pay now; $5, $6, or $7 a month.

Mr. ELLIOTT. There are no rates.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, there must be. Somebody is paying the insurance.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Well, Uncle Sam is paying out of the Treasury just as he paid for 89 percent of the deaths that grew out of World War II.

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LECOMPTE. I understand the gratuitous feature of it, but what about the man after he gets his honorable discharge? Can he buy national life insurance from the Government?

Mr. ELLIOTT. He cannot, unless he has a service-connected disability that would prevent him from obtaining commercial insurance at standard rates.

Mr. LECOMPTE. Under this bill he cannot?

Mr. ELLIOTT. He cannot.

Mr. LECOMPTE. There is no way for him to buy?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Unless he is a veteran of World War I or World War II and has some reinstatement rights under United States Government life insurance or national life insurance.

Mr. LECOMPTE. But a young man going into the service under selective service or who volunteers, would have gratuitous insurance in the armed services, but he cannot buy.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Unless he has an injury that will prohibit him from obtaining ordinary life insurance.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. My understanding is that if a veteran of World War II has a policy which has expired or lapsed, he has a right to reinstate or purchase a policy. If this bill passes, would he still have that right?

Mr. ELLIOTT. He certainly will. He will have the same rights he has now.

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEARNEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama to clarify this thought having been expressed here. This amount is in a total of $10,000. In other words, if a reservist is called back into the service carrying, we will say, $5,000 of national service life insurance, this amount of $10,000 would not be cut in half so that he would be able to carry the $5,000 national service life. He would have to either drop that or he would have to drop it in order to qualify, or his beneficiaries, for the $10,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT. If I understand what the gentleman is asking, if he came into the service with $5,000 of national service life insurance, and if he kept that $5,000, then he would have in addition to that $5,000 of the indemnity provided by this act so as to make a total of $10,000, but no more than that total.

Mr. KEARNEY. In other words, the beneficiaries could not claim any more than the total.

Mr. ELLIOTT. They could not claim any more than $10,000. But, I endeavored to point out to the gentleman that this bill provides that the fruits of this insurance can only be paid to the beneficiary in amounts of $92.90 per month over a period of 120 months, or 10 years, and $92.90 times 120 figures out more than $11,000 that this policy would bring to the beneficiary.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. My understanding is if a reservist is called in for active duty and he is killed on the day he is called in, then his family would receive $10,000 insurance?

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is right, and that is one provision of this act that is more liberal than the National Service Life Insurance Act. It provides that any person who under orders is called into the service for a period of 30 days or more is covered from the time he becomes in travel status from his home to the station where he reports, whether he be a Reserve or a National Guardman or a selectee under the Selective Service System Act of 1948. He would still be covered in the event of duty. This would cover those who were killed in the Pennsylvania train wreck and those members of the Tennessee Air Guard killed at Myrtle Beach, S. C.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. And this will go on all through the years, not just at this time?

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is right.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, last December 18, only about a month ago, this House passed without a dissenting vote H. R. 9911, which provided a gratuitous indemnity of $10,000 for all members of the Armed Forces. Unfortunately, the Senate took no action upon the measure, and it died with the adjournment of the Eighty-first Congress.

The bill we are considering today, H. R. 1, is similar in most of its details to the former measure. A few changes have been made, but the only alterations are of a perfecting nature.

For the benefit of those Members of Congress who were not here when the measure was under consideration in December, I will review the provisions of the bill. It provides that on and after June 27, 1950, each and every person in the Armed Forces is insured against death in the amount of $10,000 without cost to the person. This, naturally, would cover all of those who have been killed in the Korean conflict, as well as those National Guard men who died in the tragic train wreck, and those who died later in the airplane disaster.

Protection covers the period from order for induction into active service and for 90 days after separation from service.

If a person is disabled in service to such an extent as to make him uninsurable at standard commercial rates, he may obtain national service life insurance after his separation from service, and if his disability is permanent and total, waiver of premiums may be granted.

After enactment of this measure, entrance into United States Government life insurance and the national service life insurance program is barred. However, any person in the active service having one of these policies may continue it in force or if he has surrendered a permanent-plan policy for cash, he may reinstate it or be granted a new policy on the same plan and in the same amount without a showing of good health.

Beneficiaries are limited to the surviving spouse, child, or children—including a stepchild, adopted child, or an illegitimate child if the latter was designated as beneficiary by the insured—parent—including a stepparent, parent by adoption, or person who stood in loco parentis to the insured—brother, or sister of the insured.

Maximum indemnity of $10,000 with interest at the rate of 2¼ percent per annum is payable in 120 monthly installments. This makes the monthly installment $92.90. The total payable under this plan amounts to $11,148 over the 10-year period.

This indemnity is exempt from the claims of creditors and from taxation.

This proposal for gratuitous indemnity stems from a resolution passed by the Committee on Veterans' Affairs last May. At that time a subcommittee had completed rather extensive hearings on amendments to the National Service Life Insurance Act and it resolved that the staff of the committee should conduct an investigation during the recess of Congress of the possibilities of a new insurance law to take the place of the present National Service Life Insurance Act, but not to alter contracts that are presently in existence.

Pursuant to this resolution, the staff conducted a number of meetings with representatives of the four veterans' organizations chartered by act of Congress, the Veterans' Administration, Department of Defense, General Accounting Office, and the Bureau of the Budget.

As a result of these meetings, several bills were prepared for consideration by a special subcommittee on insurance, which conducted extensive open hearings, beginning November 23, 1950. All proposals were given minute consideration and finally the bill we have before us today was reported from the Committee on Veterans' Affairs without a dissenting vote.

That there is a great need for gratuitous indemnity is obvious, but I would like to present to my colleagues one or two salient facts concerning insurance during World War II. With the enactment of the measure under consideration we hope to eliminate such discrepancies.

As many of you know, who were in the Armed Forces during World War II, a great drive was made in every echelon of our services to bring service men and women under the protection of our Government insurance laws. Especial emphasis was made to insure those who were serving in combat areas. However, despite the careful screening and broad propaganda measures used to sell Government insurance to all who were in danger, Army casualty reports as of November 27, 1942, show that 6 percent of the officers and 25 percent of the enlisted men killed in action were without insurance coverage. In another casualty report, dated January 20, 1943, it was found that 12.79 percent of the officers and 20.05 percent of the enlisted men were without insurance. Two other reports, both dated April 5, 1943, from different theaters of war, established that all of the officers had insurance coverage, but 27 percent of the enlisted men were without insurance from one theater and those with insurance coverage had policies averaging only $5,833. In another theater, 22 percent of the enlisted men had no coverage and those with coverage had policies averaging $7,000. Or, to put it another way, one out of nine combat casualties had no life insurance whatsoever and for those covered, the average face value of policies issued from Pearl Harbor to VJ-day was slightly over $7,000.

The bill we have before us today covers every man who enters the Armed Forces and it covers him or her equally. All of us have had distressing experiences with those cases where men were killed without insurance or with too little insurance. That would not happen under this measure.

The fact that everyone would be covered equally is, to my mind, the primary reason for the enactment of this legislation. There are other compelling reasons for the passage of the bill. Testimony during our hearings, and during hearings on a similar subject before the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, developed that had this legislation been in effect during the period 1940–49, the cost to the Government would have been reduced by approximately $587,000,000. Aside from the tremendous saving in money, the great reduction in the number of personnel necessary to carry out the program is important. Undoubtedly, if the conflict in Korea continues at its present pace or if it develops into a world war III, every saving in manpower we can make must be made.

As I stated when we passed the bill last December, it is not a perfect bill, and I doubt that we can ever enact a measure that would be perfect, but it is, in my opinion, the proper approach to a problem that we must solve. I have long favored gratuitous indemnity for our fighting men and everyone will agree with me that there is an imperative need at this time for the enactment of this legislation.

In talking with my colleagues about the proposal, several of them expressed the hope that the bill could be amended so that the dependents of a deceased serviceman could obtain a small lump-sum payment immediately after death. The committee had such a proposal under consideration, but decided eventually that such a clause was unnecessary, in view of the 6-month gratuity paid to the dependents of each deceased person in the Armed Forces. Under the existing pay tables, the amount of this gratuity runs from more than $500 for a private to more than $6,000 for high-ranking officers. In the enlisted branch, payments run from $576 to $1,429, according to rank. This immediate payment was deemed sufficient to take care of any emergency need caused by the death of the serviceman.

Testimony before the committee developed that all of the services have a standard casualty form which is in every man's jacket, and every man throughout the service has a standard pay card, and either one of those could be adapted so that there would be no need for the Veterans' Administration to keep any file on who was going to get the insurance until such time as a man died.

Administrative procedures would be simplified materially. Instead of having a file of 26,000,000 insurance cases, as happened in World War II, the Veterans' Administration would not make up a file until such time as it was notified that the man had died. Then its function would be to pay the 120 installments to the dependents who had been certified by the Department of Defense.

I hope that the House will pass this bill today. The need for it is great. Our casualties in Korea are appalling and we have a moral duty to care for the dependents of these men who were told to fight for the United Nations.

Our committee has labored long and well upon the technicalities of the subject. It is not easy to enact legislation that will please all, but I believe this bill is the proper approach to the existing problem, and I hope it will pass.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to bring out again one point that I think has not ben brought too clearly: that the maximum indemnity of $10,000, with interest at the rate of 2¼ percent per annum, is payable in 120 monthly installments. This makes the monthly installment $92.90. The total payment under this plan is $11,148 over the 10-year period, so it gives the recipients an additional $1,000 or more, which is very helpful.

Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEARNEY].

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Chairman, as has already been stated, the bill H. R. 1 provides a gratuitous indemnity in the sum of $10,000 to the survivors of all members of the Armed Forces killed while on active duty on and after June 27, 1950, without any cost to the servicemen.

Before going into the provisions of this bill, let me say to my colleagues that I have always favored this type of insurance for the men and women in the armed services. I only wish this sort of legislation had been on the statute books during World War I and World War II. We have been advised that if this type of legislation had been on the statute books, particularly as reported in a bill sponsored by my colleague from Minnesota [Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN], we would have saved the taxpayers of the country somewhere between $585,000,000 and $1,000,000,000.

Mr. RANKIN. If the gentleman will yield, that would have been the saving in World War II. If this law had been in effect from the beginning of World War I down to the present time the Government probably would have saved billions of dollars in administration costs.

Mr. KEARNEY. I thank the gentleman.

The bill comes to the House as a result of a rule granted by the Rules Committee after a hearing held last Friday afternoon.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is practically the same as passed the House on December 18, 1950, then known as H. R. 9911.

Weeks of intensive hearings were conducted by a subcommittee of the Veterans' Affairs Committee of the House. The Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans and the AMVETS have all heartily endorsed the bill and have asked for its speedy enactment into law. I cannot let this occasion go by without complimenting the members of the subcommittee for a job well done.

In addition to providing a gratuitous indemnity in the sum of $10,000 to the survivors of those killed on and after June 27, 1950, it provides protection for the individual for a period of 90 days after his release from active duty in order to permit a readjustment to civilian life and determine the sort of commercial insurance he wishes to obtain.

To go on with the provisions of the bill, the beneficiaries are limited to the immediate family of the serviceman and the indemnity is paid over a 10-year period in monthly installments of $92.90, with interest at 2¼ percent.

Veterans of World War I or World War II may maintain their insurance if they are recalled to active duty, or they may avail themselves of the gratuitous insurance. Those who have the permanent insurance may surrender the policies for cash and reinstate them at a future date with a saving to the individual. This applies to reinstatement of term insurance also.

The provisions of this bill do bar the individual from taking out national service life insurance or United States Government life insurance, but anyone having either of these policies may reinstate them, if lapsed, in the manner now followed where the policy has lapsed.

The provisions of this bill cover such tragedies as the railroad wreck on September 11, 1950, when National Guard men of the Pennsylvania National Guard were bound for Camp Atterbury, Ind. These lads had just gone into the Federal service and had no opportunity to file any application before they were processed into the Federal service. These men gave their lives for their country, were on active duty, and were killed as though they were in Korea. It is just that the families of these men should be protected.

Mr. Chairman, some members have asked if this is, in effect, a substitute for the national service life insurance program we had during World War II. My answer is that it is. It is a step toward taking the Government out of permanent life insurance business and, while protecting members of the armed services while on active duty, will save millions of dollars to the Government. The Bureau of the Budget has indicated its approval of the legislation under discussion. I want it understood that by the provisions of this bill, any individual so disabled as not to be able to obtain insurance from commercial life insurance companies can, if he had national service life insurance in the past, reinstate it, or if he did not, he will be permitted to take out Government insurance. If in addition he is totally disabled as a result of service he may obtain this insurance and the premium will be waived.

Mr. Chairman, the bill also covers National Guard men while on 2 weeks' active service during the summer months of field training—aviation pilots flying a few hours a week or a month—aviation cadets on active duty.

As a member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, I will say to the House that this bill was reported from committee by a unanimous vote and I believe it to be a constructive piece of legislation and should be passed.

Mr. Chairman, I know that the information I am about to give to the House will be interesting if not revealing. During World War I, when the members of the Armed Forces totaled 4,500,000, the number of war-risk insurance policies, at its peak, was only 660,000. In World War II there were approximately 16,000,000 national service life insurance policies in effect, and from 1945 to 1946 over 9,000,000 of those policies were dropped by the individual. Today there are approximately 5,500,000 policies in effect. These figures are somewhat startling; are they not? The beneficiaries are limited to the immediate family of the serviceman, and the indemnity is paid over a 10-year period, as has already been explained by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ELLIOTT].

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNEY. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. There is one thing that troubles me, and that is whether the subcommittee looked into the question of whether a man who is brought into the Armed Forces is thereby deprived of the opportunity at that point of getting standard insurance from a civilian company, and whether or not, therefore, he should be protected for the difference between the premium rate at the age when he was called into the service, and the premium rate at the age when he was discharged from the service.

Mr. KEARNEY. I was not on the subcommittee, I will say to the gentleman from New York. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ELLIOTT] if he has any knowledge of that.

Mr. JAVITS. If I may repeat the question, then. Assuming that a man was called into the service and cannot at that point get commercial insurance or regular civilian insurance. Was there any thought given to protecting him as to the premium rate which would be effective as of his age when he was called into the service and higher premium rate effective at his age when he is discharged? In other words, he would have to seek insurance when he was discharged. Was any thought or any consideration given to that problem?

Mr. KEARNEY. No consideration was given to that.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNEY. I yield.

Mr. POTTER. Under the present program of the national insurance, is it not true that after his 5 years is up, then he goes in at his present age? When he renews his policy he has to renew it at his present age? Am I right in that assumption?

Mr. KEARNEY. You mean if you are carrying the 5-year term?

Mr. POTTER. Yes.

Mr. KEARNEY. Yes; that is so.

Mr. POTTER. So, so far as the question asked by the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS] is concerned, it would have no effect, as far as term insurance is concerned?

Mr. KEARNEY. That is correct.

Mr. CLEMENTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNEY. I yield.

Mr. CLEMENTE. Was any consideration given to the question of giving the man an opportunity to pay for his own insurance so that he could use it when he came out?

Mr. KEARNEY. Not under the provisions of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEARNEY] has again expired.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I, too, as a member of the subcommittee which held hearings on this bill, urge the Members of the House to support this legislation.

It should be made clear here, and there is seemingly some question about it, that this is a new approach. It substitutes the principle of indemnity for the system of premium-paying insurance. I think every member of the subcommittee, every member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, was completely aware of that change of approach. We realized exactly what we were doing in bringing this measure to the floor.

There are several advantages to that new approach, to the new system of indemnity coverage that would be granted to every serviceman when he went on active duty. Three major advantages can be summarized as follows:

First. It gives more adequate coverage to the man in the service.

Second. It will result in the elimination of a tremendous administrative overhead.

Third. The net cost to the taxpayers of this country will be less.

Taking those three things into consideration, any drawbacks that might be mentioned—and there have been a number of good questions asked about it—certainly fade into insignificance in view of the advantages that will be obtained under this program.

Briefly, I think we might go into those three advantages, as I see them, for just a minute.

First, more adequate coverage: I do not think there is a Member on this floor today who has not been bothered—perhaps that is not quite the correct word—but who has not had a number of veterans in his district who have had their insuranee papers fouled up. The beneficiaries of other people have had to wait for months in an attempt to get some of these things untangled. This bill does away with all of that. It simply says to a man, "We are not going to try to write out anything and give you a policy. You are automatically covered. These are the people who are the beneficiaries of that kind of indemnity that you get." There is not any heavy overhead. We simply certify that this man has lost his life while in the service and the beneficiaries are entitled automatically to get that money.

Not only a great number of bookkeeping transactions that we now have, and the fact that those records have been inadequately kept, but often have been lost—that in itself is a substantial advantage of this new kind of program.

That hints at the second advantage; that is, the elimination of the tremendous amount of administrative overhead. During World War II the Veterans' Administration had some 26,000,000 files on various men who had been in the service at one time or another. If this legislation had been in effect there would have been about 400,000—less than a half million. In other words, about one-fiftieth the number of files would have been required if we had had this legislation in effect.

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. KEARNEY. It also protects the individual, does it not, who, under some circumstances, might not even take out any insurance while in the service? So automatically he is protected or his beneficiaries are, or his heirs, up to $10,000.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. I think that is an important point. It should be brought out that the Government is stepping in here to protect the beneficiaries, the dear ones, of a man who has shown himself so irresponsible as to not want to take out the kind of insurance that he could under the present program.

This cutting down of bookkeeping work will make possible a substantial reduction in existing personnel besides forestalling the great number of additional personnel that would have to be hired if the present program were to be used with the great number of additional servicemen who are now being called to the colors. We already have in excess of 2,000,000 civilian employees in the Government, and I think that anything that can reduce it substantially ought to appeal to everyone in this House.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. And is it not true that a good many of the veterans have lost their insurance because they let it lapse? Under this bill they will, of course, be covered.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. That did happen in many cases. In a period of all-out mobilization, or even in the present emergency that we now have there always exists a shortage of qualified manpower. Here we have another example where we simply would not be able to do the job in an efficient manner if the present program were to be continued. This bill permits the doing of a better job for the serviceman with a whole lot less personnel. For instance, during 1944 and 1945, the two big years of the war effort in World War II, the Army and the Air Force alone found it necessary to allocate 7,000 man-years during 1944, and over 8,000 man-years during 1945 simply to do the paper work in connection with the national service life-insurance program. That is over and above the thousands of man-years that were necessary in the Veterans' Administration to continue that program. This in spite of the diversion of this manpower from the necessary war effort.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me call the attention of the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin to the fact that, according to the Comptroller General, had this law been in effect during the recent war we would have saved $587,000,000 in administrative expenses. That would have been enough to pay $10,000 apiece to 58,700 men, or more men than we have lost, both killed and wounded, in this Asiatic conflict.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. As I understood it, Mr. Chairman, it was not only the saving of that amount of administrative expense; it was a net saving to the taxpayers of this country on payments made during that period.

Mr. RANKIN. A net saving of that amount, enough to have taken care of all the men who have been killed, wounded, or injured in this Korean "police action."

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. I do not think it is any wonder that Mr. Harold Breining, the Assistant Administrator for Veterans' Insurance, when he testified before the Hardy subcommittee, stated that it would be an almost impossible task to try to administer a national service life insurance program if we had another period of complete mobilization. In the testimony the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARDY] asked him this question:

> In the event we have another war, would we not be able to use the present national service insurance legislation?

Mr. Breining's answer was: "I think from a manpower standpoint it would be unsatisfactory."

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. STEFAN. As I understand this legislation, if it is enacted into law the benefits will begin on June 25, 1950?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. June 27, 1950.

Mr. STEFAN. It will expire after the man's service, plus 90 days.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. That is when his indemnity coverage expires; that is correct.

Mr. STEFAN. If this legislation is enacted into law when will we stop writing national service life insurance policies?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. We will stop writing any new national service policies as of the day this law becomes effective. There will, of course, continue to be men who now have national service life insurance policies or who are entitled to reinstatement of such policies who would continue to have their national service life insurance just as they have it today.

Mr. STEFAN. Those who want to convert——

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Or those who have converted.

Mr. STEFAN. Or those who cannot secure commercial life insurance policies, will they be able to receive a national life insurance policy?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. They would have what is known as H insurance, those men whose insurability has been reduced, but they would also have, if I may say to the gentleman from Nebraska, the right of present term policyholders to reinstate that policy. That is the right they had when they took out the original contract.

Mr. STEFAN. But new national life insurance will not be written after the enactment of this law?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Yes, that is right.

Mr. STEFAN. What will happen to the 9,000,000 policies that were dropped in 1945 or 1946 as explained by the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEARNEY] a little while ago, some dropped because they could not pay; could they reinstate under this legislation?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Yes, they have a contractual right to do that. We are not affecting their present national life insurance policy at all.

Mr. STEFAN. They could reinstate?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. They could reinstate.

Mr. STEFAN. When it is stated that this takes the place of a national life insurance policy, it only takes place in those cases where new policies are required?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Let us say where a new policy would otherwise be written, because there is not any policy under this bill.

Mr. STEFAN. There would be some additional national life insurance policies written where they are converting or where they have made a conversion, where they have shown they cannot get regular commercial life insurance policies?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. STEFAN. I notice in the bill that we have taken all kinds of services, including the Coast Guard and Public Health officers and the Coast and Geodetic Survey, which automatically goes into the Navy when there is a crisis or war. Reference is made to the commissioned officers. What happens to the men?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. They will be covered under this.

Mr. STEFAN. It does not say so. It only says "commissioned officers of the Public Health Service while entitled to full military benefits as provided in section 212 (a) of the act of July 1, 1944; and commissioned officers of the Coast and Geodetic Survey while assigned to duty during a period of war or an emergency." It says nothing about the men who man the ships.

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEARNEY. I did not quite get all of the gentleman's question but if I understood correctly what I did hear, there are no noncommissioned officers in the Coast and Geodetic Survey and there are no privates. They are all officers.

Mr. STEFAN. There are commissioned officers in the Coast and Geodetic Survey, but they have large crews. What happens to the men who man the ships?

Mr. KEARNEY. We were definitely advised there are no noncommissioned officers, no warrant officers, or no privates in that organization.

Mr. STEFAN. Who mans the ships? There is a crew, is there not?

Mr. KEARNEY. For instance, the merchant marine does not come under this bill.

Mr. STEFAN. The Coast and Geodetic Survey does. I am just looking for information.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MORTON. It is my understanding those ships are manned in time of war by the Coast Guard personnel and that officers are the only employees of the Coast and Geodetic Survey at sea. The Navy and Coast Guard furnish the personnel.

Mr. STEFAN. I see.

Mr. KEARNEY. They would come under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. STEFAN. The merchant marine is not covered?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. No.

The third advantage of this proposal is the one which has been mentioned here several times and which I want to reiterate. That is, the cost would be less, and I refer to the total over-all cost. I think it should be made clear here, in order to understand, that if a man under the present program is killed while on military duty, the money to pay his beneficiary does not come out of the national life insurance fund. There has been considerable misunderstanding about that. That money today comes out of the general fund of the Treasury, and it would under the program which we are recommending here today. So that perhaps explains to many Members who would question the fact that the cost would be less. Actually a great deal of that money is being paid for by the taxpayers now. This gets rid of a lot of administrative costs, and adds a few more, not a great many more, whose beneficiaries would be paid out of the general fund. I think we can appreciate the administrative cost of the present program when we realize that the administrative cost for other than the armed services, which would be the Veterans' Administration, the Treasury, and so forth, ran in the neighborhood of $600,000,000 during World War II, and that the armed services spent over $100,000,000; that there was $31,000,000 paid in premiums for the aviation cadets.

Now, there has been some objection raised to this bill by those who object because it does not permit all persons who now start to serve in the Armed Forces to continue some form of Government insurance after discharge. Well, this bill has so many advantages that that one objection, if it be an objection, certainly ought not to carry any weight here. For my part I cannot see any more reason for a subsidized insurance program for an able-bodied veteran than I can see for the Government to sell him his groceries and his clothing or any other commodity that he may need under a method which compels the Government to pay the administrative cost thereof.

Mr. HAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. HAND. Under section 620 of the bill, if anyone is injured in the armed services and therefore is not insurable on regular rates, he may still have Government insurance; is that not right?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. That is right.

Mr. HAND. Would that be under the National Insurance Corporation now set up?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Yes; that will be handled as it is at the present time. It is not interfered with at all.

As I see it, Mr. Chairman, this bill would provide indemnity coverage for the men who wear the uniform of our country. It would get the Government out of the insurance business in times of peace; it would get rid of a great deal of administrative overhead that is not necessary and, thirdly, it would save the taxpayers of this country some money. I think there are overwhelming reasons why this House should pass this bill unanimously today, just as it did in the closing days of the Eighty-first Congress.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may desire.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to compliment the subcommittee upon their very remarkable work in bringing this bill to the main committee and the chairman of the committee and members of the committee for reporting it. I do not think any committee ever worked any harder over a bill than the subcommittee, with the staff of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, and the veterans' organizations, too. They have done a remarkable piece of work.

There is one thing I would like to bring out that I think some of the Members perhaps have forgotten, and that is that a man, a soldier, upon being separated from the service, receives a gratuity in the form of 6 months' pay. The amount of this gratuity runs from $500 for a private to more than $6,000 for the high ranking officers. In the enlisted branch it will run from $576 to $1,429, according to rank. This immediate payment, while not sufficient to take care of any emergency that was caused by the death of a serviceman, will be a great help. Some of the Members wish that a lump-sum payment of $1,000 or $2,000 could be given to the widow or the child of a beneficiary and I agree with those Members, but the committee decided that this amount would suffice.

If a lump-sum payment should be given, I think the other body will take care of it. Also I am under the impression that perhaps the other body will take care of allowing the man to take out Government life insurance after 90 days and I hope it will. I do not believe the bill could be amended on the floor without great confusion, even if the Members should want to amend it and at the moment the primary consideration is to pass the gratuitous insurance provision.

Mr. KEARNEY. If the gentlewoman will yield, in addition to what has already been spoken of here by the gentlewoman from Massachusetts, the widow, for instance, of the soldier, sailor, or marine, is also entitled to a widow's pension.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Yes; that is absolutely true. Of course, that pension does not start immediately, and the widow or the orphans would need that money at once.

Mr. Chairman I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, in any debate upon such a bill as this, which provides for a gratuitous indemnity for all members of the Armed Forces, I think it is most important to get to the salient features of the bill. As has been said, I think there are possibly two important ones. The one with reference to the gratuitous indemnity has already been discussed at quite some length. The second feature of this bill, and it seems to me certainly one that is just as important as the first one, is that after the veteran is separated from service the Government is out of the life-insurance business.

I know there are many here who have served in the Armed Forces, as I have, who may be asking why we should take the United States Government out of the insurance business for veterans. Much has been said here about the fact that there could have been saved over a half billion dollars if this bill had been in effect during the past 10 years. I should like to give a couple of examples which I think are pertinent to show the extreme administrative costs that have been incurred in the past 30 years.

I made a survey on my own and found that to service a definite number of policies in one standard life insurance company, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., it would take, according to their figures, 343 people; but I found that in the Veterans' Administration to service the same number of policies it took 1,560 people. This alone, I think, gives you some idea of the inefficiency when Government takes over a business in which it is not an expert in that particular field.

I wanted to find out what it would cost to service a policy upon myself, having been a veteran beginning 8 years ago.

I find that a man of my age who went into the service at 32 paid $7.80 a month. I am still paying the same figure. If I included the refunds which I have received from the Veterans' Administration since 1942, I have paid approximately $5.50 per month. Gentlemen, that same term life insurance policy in an old-line company today costs approximately $13 per thousand at my age. I think you can see that the Government is operating at a dead loss of approximately 58 percent for national life insurance policies issued to men at my age, which is 41 years.

Let me give you just one more example of what inefficiency in this kind of a program can amount to. At one time in the thirties the Pension Bureau of the Veterans' Administration was paying out approximately $4,000,000 a year. The cost to the Bureau to administer that program was approximately $3,000,000. This is, indeed, to me, a new Member, a sad picture of what the cost of administering this type of thing was before World War II.

To me this bill accomplishes two purposes. First, it will indemnify dependent survivors of every veteran killed from June 27, 1950. Second, it will take the United States Government out of the life-insurance business for veterans after they are separated from the service. At that period the obligation of the United States Government is definitely ended insofar as insurance is concerned.

I do not believe the Members of this body want a program which could extend, like the veterans' pension program of the Mexican War of 1848, for another 100 years.

It is my understanding this bill has the endorsement of three of the four major veterans' organizations. It has the endorsement of the National Association of Life Insurance Underwriters, and although there were commercial insurance representatives present, they did not commit themselves upon the program. However, I think it is safe to say that a large segment of this business favors the gratuitous approach and believe it would be advantageous to the servicemen and to the country.

Last, as a new member of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs I was most impressed by the thoroughness with which this whole bill was studied. I believe that the committee has done about the best job that could have been done in reporting this bill to the House. I believe it is fair to the members of the Armed Forces. As one who spent 41 months in the service, I think I got the approach of the enlisted man and the officer to this particular problem. I believe, from experience over a long period of years, you will find in your own district that this will be well received. It is an adaptable program, which is workable, and it is the most economical plan that could be provided for the servicemen.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. EVINS].

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Chairman, the bill we are considering here today is substantially the same measure as was reported unanimously by the Committee on Veterans' Affairs in the closing days of the Eighty-first Congress and passed by unanimous consent on the floor of the House at that time. It has been again favorably reported as was well pointed out. I think in view of the Korean situation it is very important that this constitute a part of the initial legislation of this new Congress. I have supported this measure both in committee and on the floor of the House. It has already been pointed out as to what the bill provides. It provides $10,000 indemnity coverage for all men called into the service. The bill is made retroactive to June 27, 1950, and covers the National Guard men who were killed in the train crash in Ohio last summer, and also the Tennessee guardsmen who were killed in an airplane crash while returning from maneuvers in South Carolina. There are other excellent features of the bill, including the monthly installment payment of $92.90 per month over a period of 10 years. The bill also restricts payments to members of the serviceman's family. The measure exempts the indemnity from claims of creditors and from taxation. All of these features of the bill are meritorious and beneficial and commend it for passage.

However, as has been pointed out, a new policy is injected into the bill with respect to part II of the bill. The position of the American Legion has not been made known heretofore with respect to this legislation. It has been said several times that two or three of the major veterans' organizations favor it, but we have here the testimony of representatives of the American Legion with respect to the measure. In brief, I might quote them as follows.

In testimony before the committee on this bill, T. O. Krable, chairman of the national rehabilitation commission of the American Legion said:

> We cannot be a party to any abridgment of the benefits and provisions that have been made by the Government to both veterans of World War I and World War II. The American Legion strongly urges that provision be made that veterans be permitted to continue their national service life insurance after separation.

Certainly the right of the veteran to obtain national service life insurance should be preserved and the right to existing benefits continued, all considerations of service being taken into account. The American Legion adopted a resolution at Indianapolis on November 19, last, reading, in part, as follows:

The American Legion reaffirms its stand that national service life insurance and United States Government insurance contracts and trust funds established heretofore should be preserved, and that an opportunity to obtain national service life insurance should be continued for members of the Armed Forces and veterans.

I have an amendment at the Clerk's desk which would permit a man, after being discharged, to apply for national service life insurance if he cares to do so. The argument has been made that such a provision would continue the Government in the insurance business. Let me say that the Government is going to continue in the insurance business for a long time to come, regardless of the action we take here today.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVINS. May I just finish this statement first, and then I will be glad to yield.

The information I have been able to obtain is that only one out of seven ex-servicemen have continued their national service life insurance after discharge. That is, as of now, only 10 percent of the veterans of World War I have continued their national service life insurance, and only 25 percent of the veterans of World War II have continued their insurance. So the number is not great, but those who wish to contract for Government life insurance should be permitted to do so after discharge. My amendment would permit this.

Here are some of the reasons why it should be done: Because it is a right that was given to veterans of World War I and extended to veterans of World War II. But to veterans of the Korean War we would deny them the right to have national service life insurance. Those men who are fighting today will probably be 2, 5, or 10 years older after the war, by which time the commercial insurance rates for them will have been enhanced. We do not know how long the emergency will continue. Commercial rates to some of our veterans might have become prohibitive by the end of the emergency and during the time they are in service. Disabilities might have been incurred which, although not recognized by the Veterans' Administration, might be recognized by commercial insurance companies, and a veteran thereby might be denied the right to take out insurance after discharge.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. EVINS] has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. EVINS. I am wholeheartedly and strongly in favor of the automatic coverage feature of this bill and am, of course, supporting the legislation, but I feel my amendment would improve and perfect the legislation by permitting the continuance of national service life insurance after discharge. Let us not say in effect to our future veteran that "After you are released from the service we will forget all about your service;" but rather let us say that a grateful Nation appreciates the service and sacrifice of our men of arms. Let us say that America will not forget. Let us perfect this legislation and let us pass it.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVINS. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman has mentioned certain coverage. Would it cover a case of this kind? A plane from the Philippines to Okinawa went into the mountains on December 19. The plane went down and some army personnel were killed. Would this bill cover a case of that kind?

Mr. EVINS. If the accident occurred after June 27, 1950, and if it were incident to call or maneuvers it would cover such an accident.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman four additional minutes.

Mr. EVINS. I thank the gentlewoman. I hope that the amendment which will be offered later may have the favorable consideration of the House.

The argument was made, as was pointed out, that this bill will take the Veterans' Administration out of the insurance business. May I say that it is going to be necessary for the Government to continue in the insurance business for the next 50 years because of existing contracts.

It has been further insisted that the bill will effect a savings in manpower. To the extent that the measure does so, I applaud the action taken. However, the manpower requirements of the bill will take effect largely after the war is over and history and experience of veterans' insurance show that only about one out of seven ex-servicemen continue their insurance and the manpower argument is not persuasive. As I say, I hope the amendment will be agreed to. If it is not adopted here, I feel sure I can predict that it will be adopted in the other body.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVINS. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MORTON. In World Wars I and II men had no coverage unless they paid for it. Is not that correct?

Mr. EVINS. That is quite true.

Mr. MORTON. So the enlisted man gets the benefit of this indemnity even though he is not permitted under the terms of the bill before us to get in on the national service life insurance program.

Mr. EVINS. Not on the national life insurance program for that is, in effect, discontinued, but he is given war service insurance coverage. After serving a period of four, five, or more years, and after discharge the veteran may find the commercial insurance rates so high as to be prohibitive.

Mr. MORTON. We can deal with that when that question comes up.

Mr. EVINS. The gentleman has pointed to the crux of this bill, the question of insurance coverage after a man has been honorably discharged and released from the service. Our future veterans should be entitled to apply for national service life insurance on the same basis as veterans of World Wars I and II.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVINS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEATING. May I inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee whether he has submitted this amendment to the committee and whether it was considered there? And, if so, what was the result?

Mr. EVINS. This amendment was not considered by the committee. The bill was reported out the first day that the committee met when the committee was organized, and the amendment was not considered. But I will say to the gentleman that it has had very careful consideration in its draftsmanship.

Mr. RANKIN. Why does not the gentleman from Tennessee tell the House that he did not bring this amendment before the committee, and that he seconded the motion to report the bill out as it is?

Mr. EVINS. I not only seconded the motion to report the bill but I have consistently supported this measure. I think the bill is a good bill but that we could improve upon it by adoption of the amendment which I have proposed.

Mr. RANKIN. Another point I would like to make for the benefit of the Members is that in previous wars the serviceman did not have the benefit of this automatic insurance.

Mr. EVINS. I may say to the gentleman that representatives of the American Legion not only made Legion position clear in testimony before the subcommittee but also sent to me a statement of its position on this issue and this statement was passed around by me to members of the committee but was not acted upon.

What action we take here today may well determine the economic security of untold thousands of families of veterans in the future. Under unanimous consent I ask that letters and telegrams in relation to this matter be included with my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATES,
NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1951.

Re H. R. 1.

Hon. JOE L. EVINS,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. EVINS: It is my understanding the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs will meet Tuesday morning, January 16, to consider what action shall be taken on H. R. 1, a bill to authorize the payment of a gratuitous indemnity in the amount of $10,000 to survivors of members of the Armed Forces who die in active service, retroactive to June 27, 1950.

As legislative spokesman for the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States I am pleased to advise that our organization is in full accord with this bill and we strongly urge early and favorable action by the Committee on Veterans' Affairs in reporting the bill to the House.

Representatives of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States have followed closely the lengthy hearings on all phases of insurance coverage for service personnel, first, in the subcommittee of the House Committee on Executive Expenditures and, secondly, in the study and hearings by the staff and subcommittee of the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs. It is our considered judgment that the gratuitous indemnity approach is the sound and reasonable method to protect the survivors of active service personnel who are killed or may die in the service.

In view of the lengthy hearings which were held on the insurance question during the Eighty-first Congress and the fact that H. R. 1 is almost identical with H. R. 9911 which was reported by the Veterans' Affairs Committee and approved by the House of Representatives in the closing days of the Eighty-first Congress, may I respectfully suggest that H. R. 1 be reported without the necessity of lengthy and formal hearings. It is quite likely that hearings will be held on the Senate side and I can see no valid reason for the House to duplicate the lengthy and voluminous work which was done in the Eighty-first Congress.

Respectfully yours,

OMAR B. KETCHUM,
Director.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 15, 1951.

Hon. JOE L. EVINS,
House of Representatives:

Disabled American Veterans endorses H. R. 1 and would appreciate your support of measure. Extensive hearings were held in Eighty-first Congress on similar proposal and these printed hearings available Veterans' Affairs Committee room. Anything you may do toward obtaining favorable report of H. R. 1 will be appreciated by DAV.

FRANCIS M. SULLIVAN,
National Legislative Director.

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., January 16, 1951.

Hon. JOE L. EVINS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. EVINS: In keeping with your telephone conversations this morning with Mr. T. C. Kraabel and myself relative to H. R. 1, I enclose several copies of a brief analysis showing our position in connection with this bill.

We are sending the extra copies to you so that you may have them available in the event you wish to distribute them to the other members of the House Veterans Affairs Committee.

Thanking you for your courtesy in the matter, I am,

Sincerely yours,

MILES D. KENNEDY, Director.

COMMENTS ON H. R. 1, EIGHTY-SECOND CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
NATIONAL REHABILITATION COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., January 16, 1951.

We respectfully submit the following views of the American Legion as to this legislation:

1. We agree that there should be an automatic-insurance protection for the members of the Armed Forces in active service from June 27, 1950.

2. We believe the extension of this protection can best be accomplished under the formula already established by Congress in its amendment to the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940 by the act of December 20, 1941. If this were done there would be protection from the beginning of hostilities, viz, June 27, 1950, up to 120 days after the enactment of an amendment to that effect.

3. We agree this automatic protection should be in the amount of $10,000 and that no dependency of the parent should be required. As to definitions of persons entitled, we believe that the rules established under existing law should govern.

4. Our principal objection to H. R. 1 is the revolutionary change that is proposed in that the right of servicemen and veterans of the present hostilities to contract for insurance in service and after separation would be taken away from them. True, the bill provides for those suffering from disablements incurred in service to take out insurance, but we submit that such an arrangement is fraught with unknown expense and difficulties in that service connection for disabilities is not established in thousands of cases until years after separation from service. If the committee is intent upon adoption of the life indemnity provisions of the bill, then the American Legion strongly urges that provision be made for veterans to obtain contract national service life insurance after separation, whether or not disabled.

5. The American Legion must vigorously object to any benefit being withdrawn from veterans which they now have. The right of persons to obtain new United States Government life insurance or new national service life insurance should not be impaired, providing they had the requisite service, either in World War I or World War II.

T. O. KRAABEL,
Director.

CHARLES W. STEVENS,
Assistant Director.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I think the committee is to be commended for this very constructive piece of legislation.

Most of us, I think, when we reach our first reaction on this legislation find it difficult to realize that we can provide a gratuitous indemnity at less cost to the Government than was the case when a premium was charged for insurance policies; nevertheless, that is the fact. There seems to be some question as to the amount of savings that will be effected; the estimates run all the way from $450,000,000 over a 10-year period to over a billion. I am inclined to go along with the estimate of the General Accounting Office of $587,000,000. I think that is conservative and that perhaps the savings may actually be somewhat more than that, while at the same time there is general coverage for all of the men in the services rather than purely for those who elect to pay premiums.

I want to talk about another phase of this matter this afternoon. I was in a meeting of the Committee on Armed Services considering a revision of the selective service law under which we are proposing to induct men below the age of 19. We are forced to that position because of the critical manpower shortage. A great deal has been said about the administrative cost to the Veterans' Administration, but I have not heard much said about what it costs the armed services for their participation in the national service life insurance program. I have not heard a great deal said about the military personnel whose time is consumed in explaining national service life insurance to the personnel of the services. I call attention of the Committee to the fact that in 1945 in the Army and Air Force alone more than 8,000 man-years of military personnel were employed in connection with national service life insurance.

As our Military Establishment increases in size—I do not know what is being required at the present time—the demand and the requirements upon the military to detail men for the handling of national service life insurance will increase and if it has not already reached the point it reached in 1945 it will very soon. It is inconceivable to me that we should take more than 8,000 men who otherwise would be serving in a military capacity and assign them to purely administrative work in connection with the sale of national service life insurance to the men. That is a gross waste of manpower in my judgment.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. EVINS. The statement which the gentleman has just made would not apply, however, after the war is over.

Mr. HARDY. Of course, the gentleman is correct. But when do we need this military personnel? We need them while the war is going on, we need them now, and if the situation becomes worse we are going to need them more than we do today.

Mr. EVINS. There is nothing in the bill which would divert the manpower under this automatic coverage.

Mr. HARDY. Under the automatic coverage these people would not be required for national service life insurance purposes. They could be used for much more useful purposes.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. May I say to the gentleman from Virginia that I did quote to the House the figures which he just mentioned regarding the 8,000 man-years for 1945. I got those figures from a very good report which the subcommittee, headed by the gentleman now addressing the Committee, made in connection with a study on this subject. I want him to know also that our subcommittee leaned very heavily upon the information which his subcommittee uncovered in that respect as well as in many other respects in formulating this legislation.

Mr. HARDY. I thank the gentleman. I do recall the observation concerning the statement which Mr. Breining made in connection with the situation which would arise in the event we had an emergency. Mr. Breining made a flat, unequivocal statement before our committee that in another national emergency the manpower would not be available to the Veterans' Administration if we should continue the national service life insurance program.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. I am grateful to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Would the 8,000 people the gentleman from Tennessee is talking about be carried on the roll under the pretense they are needed?

Mr. HARDY. The 8,000 people I have reference to are members of the Armed Forces and that covers only the Army and Air Force. It does not include the Navy personnel. If those people were released from their duties in connection with the handling of national service life insurance, and they would be, they could devote their time and attention to much more essential activities.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Is it not true that in the gentleman's subcommittee you were unable to get any breakdown from the Veterans' Administration as to how many thousand man-years it is now taking them to administer this law?

Mr. HARDY. That is correct. I was interested in listening to some comparisons made by one of the gentlemen on this side a while ago as between the personnel required by commercial insurance companies and the Government insurance agency. I do not know where he got his figures because we were not able to secure them. Certain functions in connection with life insurance are carried on by other divisions than the insurance division in the Veterans' Administration and as a consequence there is no breakdown and you cannot get the figures.

Mr. Chairman, there is one more point I want to call attention to. The Veterans' Administration right now maintains approximately 23,000,000 individual active and semiactive insurance files. If H. R. 1 had been in effect in 1940 the Veterans' Administration would have less than 500,000 insurance files, a reduction in administrative paper work of more than 95 percent.

If there is one thing we can do without in Uncle Sam's Government today, it is some of the unnecessary paper work that goes on. There are a great many factors that enter into the cost of national service life insurance to the Government. I am pretty sure they have been discussed, perhaps, in some of the debate that I have not heard. But the main thing to me that this legislation means to the servicemen and to the families of the servicemen is that, regardless of whether the individual has sufficient foresight to take out insurance, his dependents are protected and covered. We had relatively a small percentage of the total people in the service during the last war who had the foresight to protect their families in that manner. Under this legislation, every man will be treated equally. I think it was a travesty on justice where we had, we will say, three people that might have been killed at the same time. One of them had $5,000 insurance under national service life. His beneficiary under that policy received the $5,000 paid for out of the Federal Treasury. He was killed in combat. The second man had a $10,000 policy, and Uncle Sam out of the Federal Treasury paid his beneficiary $10,000. The third man had not seen fit to pay the premium to cover him for insurance, so consequently Uncle Sam paid nothing to his beneficiary. Now, it seems to me that the life of one man means just as much to the Nation as the life of another, and each of them should have had equal treatment.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HAMILTON C. JONES].

Mr. HAMILTON C. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I have been a member of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs for the last 4 years. I consider this one of the most important bills that we have ever considered. It has been my privilege to vote for it twice before the committee and once before the House, and I look toward voting for it today. There are a great many GI's who are not able to take out the insurance. I know of a number of them who are not able to take out the insurance and did not take it out and do not have it now. This gives it to them, I think, at a minimum cost, and I think it is a splendid bill.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is one of the most important bills of its kind coming before the Committee on Veterans' Affairs since I have been a member of the committee. The question of insurance has been an enigma before the committee for some time. We have all been impressed with the fact that the program for insurance of GI's has been costing more than it should without recurring benefit to the veterans or the Government. Furthermore, we have been impressed with the fact that many GI's have not been protected by death insurance. Some because of carelessness, but most of them because of the cost of insurance added to many other expenses made it financially impossible for them to carry it.

It has been estimated by the Comptroller General that had this program been in effect during 1940 through 1949, the cost to the Government would have been reduced by approximately $587,000,000. This bill is a practical, efficient one and should be passed by the Congress as it sets up a protection in case of death for every GI without any cost to him and at the same time saves the Government the enormous expense over a period of years of collecting and receipting premiums paid and naturally reduces the cost of the insurance program in case of death by substantial figures as above stated. And, last but not least, it gives a protection of $10,000 in case of death to every GI in the service of his country, which continues through the period of induction into the service and 90 days after separation from same.

I am very strongly in favor of the bill, and wish I could discuss it more fully.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES].

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, in these trying times as we occupy ourselves so extensively with the problems overseas we are apt to overlook the problems that are at our very side and seem to forget the tremendous and terrifying national debt that is following in our wake. If we do not take affirmative action in this area shortly, we will not have to concern ourselves with communism overseas, because it will already have made a salient attack in our back door.

The basic question before us today is whether you believe in bureaucracy, whether or not you want the United States Government to be in a business, in which I personally do not believe it should be. That is the basic decision we have to face, and that will be the issue on which we will vote when the amendment is presented to this bill.

I believe this legislation faces up to our responsibility. It was recommended by the Hook Commission. It contains that very unusual combination of giving free and wider benefits to servicemen and their dependents, and at less cost to the taxpayer.

The basic features of the bill are outlined in detail in the report and have also been outlined by previous speakers. It is not my intention to reiterate them at this time. However, down through the years it has been evident that the national life insurance system has not been satisfactory. Intermittent legislation has been necessary to placate the symptoms of inadequacy that are in the system. This is the first time we have made a real attempt to get at the causes of the trouble.

Among the faults of the National Life Insurance Act was that it did not, in fact, give uniform benefits to all members of the service. That was because, unfortunately, many members in the lower-paid brackets did not have the financial ability nor the interest to select this particular program.

There is a serious question in my mind, too, Mr. Chairman, whether or not we should call national life insurance real insurance, because the fact of the matter is, that at the present time between 80 percent and 89 percent of the payments are paid, not out of the fund, but by direct appropriations of the Federal Government. The present system is complex, and it is expensive. It costs $80,000,000 a year and requires 25,000 people to operate it.

I call the attention of the committee to the report of the Veterans' Administration Insurance Administrator, appearing on page 3 of the committee report, in which he said in part:

> In time of emergency I think the manpower to operate an insurance system, projecting in the future, would probably not be available.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. EVINS. The gentleman does not contend that if my amendment would prevail to permit the life insurance after discharge and after the war is over, the manpower problem would be persuasive?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I quite agree with the gentleman that his amendment would have no effect whatsoever upon the present situation.

It will, however, have a very serious effect upon the financial stability of this Government at the end of the war when we will have to certainly face most desperate financial problems.

In addition to these facts, Mr. Chairman, only one-sixth of the veterans today have continued their national life insurance. In other words, the program is being supported by the taxpayers and by five-sixths of the veterans who did not choose to continue the program. There have been many ridiculous situations arising during these last few years. The aviation cadets who did not even pay the premiums on their insurance, were paid dividends by the Federal Government even though their insurance policy did not cost them one cent.

Mr. Chairman, almost every witness who appeared before our committee was strongly in favor of this bill. This is a chance to save money and it is an opportunity to extend benefits to the servicemen and their dependents. I believe the bill should receive the unanimous vote of this body.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. AYRES].

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to offer an amendment to this bill, but that was prior to realizing that it had been discussed fully in the subcommittee. The amendment I had proposed to offer was not one of changing the amount of money which we are proposing to pay the beneficiary of a serviceman, but it is putting it on a level where we would be taking a little human interest in the people who are going to be receiving the money.

During the war I had occasion to call on a number of people who were the beneficiaries of servicemen who had been killed in action. I can assure you there is no time in a mother's life or in a widow's life when she is more disturbed than when she receives the wire saying that her son or husband has been killed in action. By the same token there is no time in her life when she needs a morale builder more and the insurance helps her to know that she is not going to be left destitute. I have felt from a human point of view that the $10,000 should be paid in a lump sum of $2,000 on the death of the soldier, and the $8,000 spread in monthly payments over a period of 10 years. I feel we would be doing the widow or mother a big favor by assuring her that she at least has a little financial backing to readjust herself—it is at that time when she needs this assistance. It has been mentioned she is going to receive 6 months' pay. Having been in the Army myself, and having been drafted when I had three children, if I had remained in the Army much longer I would not even have had a roof over my head.

On the other hand, if we can give them a little cash to readjust themselves, and give them the assurance that the whole world is not against them because most of these people think that the whole world is against them, and sometimes they are a little doubtful as to whether they can readjust themselves; as I say, if we can give them a little cash at that time, it would be encouraging to them. However, in view of the fact I am in agreement with the bill and know that it should be passed, and if this amendment is necessary in the opinion of the people of America, and in the opinion of the House of Representatives, it can be referred to the other body when it comes before them. I shall work in that direction.

I think the subcommittee has done a good job. I believe the chairman of the committee is right when he asks for the passage of the bill.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYRES. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman's amendment has a great deal of merit. I am very sure the gentleman will get every assistance and perhaps the amendment can be introduced in the bill there.

Mr. AYRES. If it is found that the amendment is necessary, I hope that that may be done. I trust the Members will be willing to express their views when this bill is referred to the other body.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I will be very glad to help if the gentleman would like to have me do so.

Mr. AYRES. I repeat that the bill should be passed. Speaking from a small-business man's point of view, I am for any bill that will get us less government and better government, and get the Government out of business. This bill is a step in the right direction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. STAGGERS].

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to compliment the members of the subcommittee for the splendid work they have done on this bill. I think it is one of the best pieces of work that has come out of the Veterans' Affairs Committee since I have been a member of it. The members of that subcommittee were the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Noland, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ELLIOTT], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DAVIS], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MACK], and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES]. Those Members present have spoken today and have given their reasons for the passage of the bill.

I believe that the bill H. R. 1 carries an appropriate number, because I think it ought to be No. 1 on the House Calendar to see that we take care of this obligation.

While I went back home last week end, I talked to several people, who raised some objections to the bill, simply because they did not understand it. Several people, knowing that I was a member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, made objection to the bill saying that it would raise their taxes. After explaining to them that it would not raise their taxes a bit, that alleviated the situation somewhat. Others raised the question that we were raising the pay of the boys in the service. That is not true. Only the dependents of those boys who are killed or lose their lives might receive additional benefits. But that is not the question. It costs the Government less. We have an obligation to these boys. As we all know, all through history our soldiers have been taken from their families. And they have nothing to say about it. We have an obligation to those dependent families, and this is one way to pay it, because if they lose their lives this will hold out some help in the support of those dependents.

This covers everyone. It does not cover just those who can afford to pay for it or those who have enough foresight to take out insurance, or those who think enough of their dependents to take out insurance. There are a great many of our veterans who go into the service who do not care about the people back home at all. Normally, those are the ones who need this protection. It does cover them, as well as those in the higher brackets, who can afford to pay for it.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAGGERS. I yield.

Mr. HARDY. I would like to ask the gentleman, or the chairman of the committee, this question. On the first page of the bill there is included Reserve components, including the National Guard, and so forth. Under certain conditions, certain reserves have protection of a sort under the Employees' Compensation Act. I presume it is not the purpose of the committee to provide duplicate coverage for identical hazards. I just wanted to be certain that my understanding is correct, and that people who are determined to be eligible to receive benefits under the Employees' Compensation Act will not also receive benefits under this act.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAGGERS. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Virginia is entirely correct.

Mr. HARDY. In other words, if an individual receives benefits under this act he would not be eligible for benefits under the Employees' Compensation Act?

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman is correct. We do not give anybody double insurance.

Mr. STAGGERS. I thank the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARDY] for his observation, because I believe it is proper that we should not duplicate in any way.

Now, the bill costs less, as it has been shown to you, and it gets the Government out of the insurance business, which it ought to do. I was interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] in regard to the cost of private insurance and the cost of Government insurance. For an equal number of men it required over 300 men to administer the commercial insurance, but for the Government it took over 1,500 men to administer the same insurance. Also I was very much interested in the statement of the gentleman from Virginia as to the matter of man-years needed to take care of our national service life insurance program. I am in favor of the bill 100 percent as it is. I hope it will be voted up.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, nearly 9 years ago, by the introduction of H. R. 6512, in February 1942, I first requested of the Congress that automatic insurance be given all men and women the instant they were sworn into the armed services of our Nation. I said on that day, quoting from the RECORD:

Mr. Speaker, the United States will probably call up for service 10,000,000 or more of the best men of our country. These men are willing to give their lives that our Nation might live. To me it seems that our great country can at the very least give, free of charge, to each and every one of these men, a $5,000 life-insurance policy to afford protection to their dear ones back home in case the ultimate sacrifice is exacted. I am today [February 2, 1942] introducing a bill to take care of this obligation to our servicemen and sincerely hope that this automatic insurance will soon become the law of our land.

Mr. Chairman, on February 5, March 2, May 26, and June 8, 1942, I spoke to the House, asking and pleading for consideration of my proposal. On June 8, I offered my bill, H. R. 6512, as an amendment to H. R. 7119, which provided family allowances for the families of enlisted men in the armed services. In the debate on the rule, I read from the RECORD of June 8, 1942, page 5013:

Last November I suggested to General Hines, of the Veterans' Administration, in committee, that it was fundamentally sound and just that any man or woman entering any branch of our armed services should be automatically covered on entrance into the service by insurance. * * * In line with that study and contention, and after consultation with the Veterans' Administration as to the wording of the bill, I introduced on February 2, 1942, H. R. 6512. Hearings on this was requested of the Ways and Means Committee without success.

Mr. Chairman, that refusal of the Ways and Means Committee to consider the principle of automatic insurance as contained in my bill, H. R. 6512, the genesis of the bill before us today, cost the taxpayers of America $587,000,000. Comptroller General Warren has estimated that amount would have been saved had my proposal as to automatic insurance been in effect during the World War II period—see the report, page 2.

On June 8, 1942, when pleading with the House to accept H. R. 6512 as an additional title to H. R. 7119, I said, among other things, page 5030:

Why in the name of common sense should we provide 2,000 stenographers to sit up here in some Government building, to write out these eight or ten million policies, all of which would be unnecessary under this amendment? Bookkeeping starts—

Referring to H. R. 6512—

when the War and Navy Departments certifies to the national service life insurance that a certain man has been killed or totally disabled. That is where bookkeeping starts, rather than having no one knows how many women writing out policies, checking monthly collections from every unit in the services, and filling out forms without number. If you want to cut red tape, this will do it. Let us give to the servicemen's children this money instead of to unnecessary office workers.

That was my statement of 9 years ago.

Mr. Chairman, now we are finally cutting this red tape, but only after a loss to America of over one-half billion dollars and no one knows how many heartaches of servicemen's dependents.

Mr. Chairman, I want to sincerely compliment the Committee on Veterans' Affairs for bringing out this very worthwhile legislation, even though we should have had it long ago.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. In just a minute I will yield.

On February 14, 1942, I had received a letter from the Legion post in Starbuck, Minn., advising me as follows:

We have buried two draftees. The last one, of a destitute family, was buried by the county, a $60 burial. He had an honorable discharge, got an infection while he was in service, spent 5 weeks at Walter Reed Hospital, had his leg amputated, was sent home to die, which he did a month later. I called the Veterans' Administration in Minneapolis. They said there was no provision for giving to that family any relief in that particular case.

W. W. LARSON,
Service Officer.

That letter, Mr. Chairman, is really the heart, so to speak, of my interest in this sort of legislation. Every service man and woman must be covered by insurance in fairness to themselves and their families.

It has been brought out here several times today that we cannot leave it to each and every individual member of the Armed Forces to decide whether or not he should take out insurance. It is for his best interest that we cover them all under a compulsory blanketing program of insurance. I feel positive that the committee has in this bill protected fully all of the rights which the veterans and service men and women are entitled to under present-day legislation. There should never again be any question of a situation happening as referred to in the letter I have just read from the American Legion post of Starbuck, Minn. We simply must not permit the possibility of such again happening.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. EVINS. In the case the gentleman referred to, was the man killed in service or was he a veteran after discharge?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. This has been nearly 9 years ago and I do not recall the exact circumstances. I am reading from the RECORD of June 8, 1942.

Mr. EVINS. If he was a discharged veteran there would still be no protection under this law.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. If he should die within 3 months after his discharge he would be covered by this bill even though he might have received his injury after he came home.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. As one gentleman brought out on the floor of the House today, unless we watch out for the financial stability of this Government we are apt to get into very serious difficulties. From that particular side of the question alone, the Committee on Veterans' Affairs is entitled to the thanks of the people of the Nation for bringing in this very worth-while legislation. Think what we could have done with this $600,000,000 wasted unnecessarily in the last 10 years. Think of what good we could have done with it in helping the widows and children of the men who were killed during World War II. I was amazed to hear that 8,000 Army officers and men were required to take care of all of the work in the armed services in connection with national service life during World War II. Surely that many men and that effort should have been put to far better use and today we profit from the lesson which cost us so dearly.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. The gentleman refers to the $600,000,000 that would have been saved. How about the millions of dollars that would have been saved to World War I and World War II veterans who had to pay monthly premiums?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. The gentleman is absolutely correct. The committee will pardon me for making this talk. Sometimes it may be considered in poor taste to get up here and say, "I told you so," but I am not trying to do anything of that kind. To me this is the correction of a costly blunder made 9 years ago and we can all profit from our experiences of the past. The service men and women will be well protected by the bill before us and I am much pleased that we have today practically a complete agreement upon this very worth-while measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON].

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to commend the Committee on Veterans' Affairs for bringing this important legislation, H. R. 1, so necessary to the welfare of our servicemen and their families before the House at this early date. It means much to our servicemen and their families. It is a worth-while and constructive approach in the important matter of providing insurance benefits in case of death resulting from service.

The bill provides:

First. On and after June 27, 1950, each person in the Armed Forces is insured against death in the amount of $10,000 without cost to the person.

Second. Protection covers period of active service and periods following call or order to active service or final induction and, in most cases, 90 days after separation from service.

Third. If person is disabled in service to such an extent as to make him uninsurable at standard commercial rates, he may obtain nonparticipating national service life insurance after separation from service, and where the disability is total, waiver of premiums may be granted.

Fourth. Bars generally future entrants to United States Government life insurance and the national service life insurance programs, after enactment of this act. But any person in the active service having one of these policies may continue it in force or if he has surrendered a permanent plan policy for cash, he may reinstate it or be granted a new policy on the same plan and in the same amount without a showing of good health.

Fifth. Beneficiaries limited to members of immediate family.

Sixth. Maximum indemnity paid in monthly installments of $92.90 each over 10-year period.

Seventh Indemnity is exempt from the claims of creditors and from taxation.

Enactment of this uniform indemnity coverage bill will remove what has been considered a basic inequity and inadequacy in the Government insurance program. Take, for example, the case of three individuals. They were all in combat service. Each was married and had children. For reasons best known to themselves one had no national service life insurance coverage; another one of them had taken out a $5,000 term policy of insurance; the remaining one had taken out a $10,000 policy. They were all in the same outfit and subject to the same hazards. All three were killed. The family of the one who held a $5,000 policy received $5,000 from the Government, the family of the one who held a $10,000 policy received $10,000. But the family of the one who had not taken out any insurance received nothing. This unfortunate result was due to the failure by neglect, or lack of interest, upon the part of the last-named serviceman, for the welfare of his family. The family suffers as a result. This bill seeks to correct such a possibility by providing a straight $10,000 indemnity policy to all servicemen, payable in the event of death as a result of service.

Thus, this bill provides uniform coverage for all men in the service, which is quite different from the situation presently prevailing under national service life insurance. This bill protects the interests of all dependents of all men in the service to a uniform degree, which the present and existing program does not do. It is my opinion that uniform benefits to all servicemen are highly desirable. The present emergency makes prompt action imperative.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time. I do not believe there will be a vote against this bill. I have long favored veterans' insurance.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMPSON].

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, among some very limited objections to this bill was the statement that the young soldier after he gets out of the service will not be able to buy from the commercial companies a policy as inexpensively as he could from the NSLI. I believed that statement until I checked into the figures.

For the information of the committee the tabluation which I shall include shows that a man coming out of the service at age 20, 25, or 30, can buy his insurance from commercial companies for less money than it would cost him from the Government. To substantiate that I include the following statistical information:

NOTE.—The 78 companies (all companies showing figures for 5-year term in Fliteraft Compendium for 1950) are spread all over the country in 33 different States and the District of Columbia.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the balance of the time on this side.

Mr. Chairman, may I say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMPSON], that I am carrying my straight-life insurance under the Veterans' Administration and I am paying $38.20 a month for life for a coverage of $10,000. I could probably have got the same insurance from a private company without paying any more.

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CAMP. I have had considerable experience with life-insurance companies, and I never heard that statement made before. I think the gentleman is incorrect. I think the rates of private companies are higher than national servicemen's rates. That is my opinion.

Mr. RANKIN. I was giving the gentleman the figures, and he can check up on them any time he desires to do so. In my opinion, if I had taken out this insurance in a private company, I would not have been paying as much as $38.20 a month for $10,000 life insurance.

Mr. MACK of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I strongly favor the enactment of H. R. 1 which is designed to give gratuitous insurance to our boys on active duty in our military and naval forces. As a member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee during the last Congress, it was my privilege to serve on the subcommittee studying this insurance program, during the closing days of that Congress. This committee worked diligently for many days trying to find the solution to the many inequities that existed in the national service life insurance program. With Mr. Noland ably serving as its chairman the committee brought forth the solution to our problems. I feel that our former colleague should be commended for his outstanding work as chairman of this subcommittee which drafted the original gratuitous insurance bill. He has not only rendered a great service to the men in our military forces but to the taxpayers of our country as well.

It has been estimated that over $500,000,000 could have been saved if this bill had been enacted prior to World War II. This bill eliminates the necessity of keeping files on the individuals in the military service in the insurance department of the Veterans' Administration and the administrative expense of making the deductions for the insurance premiums. It eliminates the mortality and annuity table calculations and the necessity of having insurance salesmen in our military forces. In my opinion this gratuitous insurance program is the only sound solution to the insurance program and it is urgently needed at this very time as many new men are being called into the services.

During the last two wars many of our men served and were killed without having the protection for their beneficiaries as provided in this bill because they failed to make application for Government insurance. Many others felt that they could not afford the premiums for $10,000 and therefore settled for lesser amounts. In many cases the men with little or no insurance were from families that needed this assistance the most. I am not of the opinion that the families of these men should be penalized because of the lack of foresight of these veterans who failed to apply for national service life insurance.

Under this bill universal coverage would be provided and the beneficiaries of every man and woman in our military services would be protected in the event of his death. In view of the fact that this bill would effect substantial savings for our taxpayers and at the same time provide additional benefits for our servicemen, I believe that it merits the support of every Member of this Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.—

PART I—SERVICEMEN'S INDEMNITY

SECTION 1. This part may be cited as the "Servicemen's Indemnity Act of 1951."

SEC. 2. Except as hereinafter provided, on and after June 27, 1950, any person in the active service of the Army, Navy, Air Force, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, or the Reserve components thereof, including the National Guard, when called or ordered to active duty or active training duty for 14 days or more; cadets and midshipmen at the United States Military, Naval, and Coast Guard Academies; commissioned officers of the Public Health Service while entitled to full military benefits as provided in section 212 (a) of the act of July 1, 1944 (58 Stat. 689), as amended (42 U. S. C. 213); and commissioned officers of the Coast and Geodetic Survey while assigned to duty during a period of war or an emergency as proclaimed by the President or the Congress on projects for the Army, Navy, or Air Force in areas outside the continental United States or in Alaska or in coastal areas of the United States determined by the Department of Defense to be of immediate military hazard, shall be automatically insured by the United States, without cost to such person, against death in such service in the principal amount of $10,000: Provided, That any person called to extended active service for a period exceeding 30 days shall continue to be so protected for a period of 90 days after separation or release from such active service: Provided further, That persons in the Reserve components, including the National Guard, while engaged in aerial flights in Government owned or leased aircraft for any period, with or without pay, as an incident to their military or naval training, shall be deemed to be in the active service for the purposes of this act.

SEC. 3. Upon certification by the Secretary of the service department concerned of the death of any person deemed to have been automatically insured under this part, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall cause the indemnity to be paid as provided in section 4 only to the surviving spouse child or children (including a stepchild, adopted child, or an illegitimate child if the latter was designated as beneficiary by the insured), parent (including a stepparent, parent by adoption, or person who stood in loco parentis to the insured), brother, or sister of the insured. The insured shall have the right to designate the beneficiary or beneficiaries of the indemnity within the classes herein provided; to designate the proportion of the principal amount to be paid to each; and to change the beneficiary or beneficiaries without the consent thereof but only within the classes herein provided. If the designated beneficiary or beneficiaries do not survive the insured, or if none has been designated, the Administrator shall make payment of the indemnity to the first eligible class of beneficiaries according to the order set forth above, and in equal shares if the class is composed of more than one person.

Any installments not paid to a beneficiary during such beneficiary's lifetime shall be paid to the named contingent beneficiary, if any; otherwise, to the beneficiary or beneficiaries within the permitted class next entitled to priority.

SEC. 4. The indemnity shall be payable in equal monthly installments of 120 in number with interest at the rate of 2¼ percent per annum.

SEC. 5. The automatic indemnity coverage authorized by section 2 shall apply to any person in the active service of the named Armed Forces who, upon death in such active service, or within 90 days after separation or release from such active service as prescribed in section 2, is insured against such death under a contract of national service life insurance or United States Government life insurance, but only with respect to a principal amount of indemnity equal to the difference between the amount of insurance in force at the time of death and $10,000. Any person in active service, who is insured under a permanent plan of national service life insurance or United States Government life insurance, may elect to surrender such contract for its cash value. In any such case the person, upon application in writing made within 90 days after separation from active service, may be granted, without medical examination, permanent plan insurance on the same plan not in excess of the amount surrendered for cash, or may reinstate such surrendered insurance upon payment of the required reserve and the premium for the current month. Waiver of premiums under the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, shall not be denied in any case in which it is shown to the satisfaction of the Administrator that total disability of the applicant commenced prior to the date of his application.

SEC. 6. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is authorized to promulgate such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions of this part, as are necessary or appropriate to carry out its purposes.

SEC. 7. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this part, to be known as the servicemen's indemnity appropriation, for the payment of liabilities under this part.

SEC. 8. Any person guilty of mutiny, treason, spying, or desertion, or who, because of conscientious objections refuses to perform services in the land or naval forces of the United States or refuses to wear the uniform of such force, shall forfeit all rights to an indemnity under this act: Provided, That this provision shall not apply to any person who is thereafter restored to active duty. No indemnity shall be payable for death inflicted as a lawful punishment for crime or for military or naval offense, except when inflicted by an enemy of the United States.

SEC. 9. The provisions of Public Law No. 262, Seventy-fourth Congress, approved August 12, 1935 (49 Stat. 607), and titles II and III of Public Law No. 844, Seventy-fourth Congress, approved June 29, 1936 (49 Stat. 2031), insofar as they are applicable, shall apply to the provisions of this part: Provided, That assignments of all or any part of the beneficiary's interest may be made by a beneficiary to a widow, widower, child, father, mother, brother, or sister of the insured, when all other persons within the permitted classes join in the assignment.

PART II—RESTRICTIONS ON ISSUANCE OF UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT LIFE INSURANCE AND NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE

SEC. 10. The National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, is hereby amended by adding the following new sections:

"SEC. 619. On and after the date of enactment of the Insurance Act of 1951, except as otherwise provided in section 11 thereof, and section 5 of the Servicemen's Indemnity Act of 1951 and section 620 hereof, no national service life insurance or United States Government life insurance shall be granted to any person under the provisions of the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, or the World War Veterans Act, 1924, as amended, nor shall any Government life insurance or national service life insurance, on which the United States is authorized by law to pay the premium, be issued or granted to any person under any provision of law: Provided, That the foregoing shall not be construed to prohibit the granting or issuing of national service life insurance or United States Government life insurance in cases in which acceptable applications accompanied by proper and valid remittances or authorizations for the payment of premiums have, prior to the date of approval of the Insurance Act of 1951, been received by the Veterans' Administration, or which have, prior to said date, been placed in the mails properly directly to the Veterans' Administration, or been delivered to an authorized representative of any of the uniformed services.

"SEC. 620. Any person who is released from active service under other than dishonorable conditions on or after the date of enactment of the Insurance Act of 1951, and is found by the Administrator to be suffering from a disability or disabilities for which compensation would be payable if 10 percent or more in degree which renders such person uninsurable at standard rates for ordinary life insurance, according to recognized underwriting requirements of nongovernmental insurers, shall, upon application in writing made within 1 year from the date of release from active service and payment of premiums as provided in this act, be granted insurance by the United States against the death of such person occurring while such insurance is in force. Insurance granted under the provisions of this section shall be on a nonparticipating basis and all premiums and other collections therefor and premiums and other collections hereafter received on nonparticipating insurance issued under other provisions of this act, as amended, shall be credited directly to a revolving fund in the Treasury of the United States, and any payments on such insurance shall be made directly from such fund. Appropriations to such fund are hereby authorized. Except as herein provided, the other provisions of this act shall be for application to such insurance: Provided, That waiver of premiums under section 602 (n) shall not be denied under this subsection on the ground that total service-connected disability commenced prior to the effective date of such insurance."

SEC. 11. Nothing contained in this act shall be construed to affect any rights under insurance contracts issued on or prior to the date of this enactment.

SEC. 12. This part may be cited as the Insurance Act of 1951."

Mr. RANKIN (interrupting the reading of the bill). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be printed at this point, and that it be open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendments:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "Guard", strike out the comma.

Page 2, line 25, after the colon, insert "And provided further, That for the purposes of this part, any person, who, on or after June 27, 1950, was or shall be provisionally accepted and directed or ordered to report to a place for final acceptance or for entry upon active duty in the military or naval service and who died or shall die as the result of disability incurred while en route to such place, or any registrant under the Selective Service Act of 1948, as amended, who on or after June 27, 1950, in response to an order to report for induction into the Armed Forces and who, after reporting to a local draft board, died or dies as the result of disability incurred while en route from such draft board to a designated induction station shall be deemed to have died in active service."

Page 4, line 9, after "installments", insert "of an indemnity."

Page 5, after line 11, insert "Any person in the active service having United States Government life insurance or national service life insurance on the 5-year level-premium-term plan, the term of which expires while such person is in active service after the date of this enactment, shall, upon application made within 90 days after separation from service, payment of premiums and evidence of good health satisfactory to the Administrator, be granted an equivalent amount of insurance on the 5-year level-premium-term plan at the premium rate for his then attained age."

Page 5, line 23, after "case", insert "of issue or reinstatement of insurance on a permanent plan under this section."

Page 9, line 15, after the word "in", insert "part I or part II."

Page 9, line 16, strike out "affect" and insert "cancel or restrict."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EVINS: Strike out all of part II and substitute the following:

"PART II—ISSUANCE OF NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE

"SEC. 10. Section 602 (c) of the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, is hereby amended by adding the following new paragraph:

"'(4) Any person who has had active service on and after June 27, 1950, and prior to the termination of the present emergency, as proclaimed by the President, shall be granted national service life insurance upon application therefor in writing after discharge or release from such active service and upon payment of premiums and evidence satisfactory to the Administrator showing such person to be in good health at the time of such application: Provided, That in any case in which such application is made within 5 years after discharge or release from active service the Administrator shall not deny for the purposes of this paragraph that the applicant is in good health because of any disability or disabilities for which compensation would be payable if 10 percent or more in degree, and waiver of premiums under section 602 (n) shall not be denied in any case under this paragraph on the ground that total service-connected disability commenced prior to the effective date of such insurance: And provided further, That in any case in which insurance is granted by reason of the preceding proviso the premium paid on such insurance shall be credited directly to the national service life insurance appropriation, and any payments of benefits on such insurance shall be made directly from such appropriations.'

"SEC. 11. This part may be cited as the 'Insurance Act of 1951.'"

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Chairman, this is a simple amendment. May I say that I have had the assistance of the Legislative Drafting Service, of the general counsel's office of the Veterans' Administration, and of the officials of the various veterans' organizations with respect to the language in this amendment. So it has been carefully prepared. It provides simply in substance that an honorably discharged veteran after the present hostilities may make application for and where qualified and on the same basis be granted national service life insurance as veterans of World War I and World War II. All this amendment does is give to future veterans the opportunity to acquire national service life insurance. We know that there will not be the great administrative cost of the insurance program during any future war under terms of this bill. The amendment which I propose would permit those who desire to contract for Government insurance after discharge the right to do so. We have already pointed out that the percentage of veterans who acquired insurance after discharge has, in the past, been limited in number, but those veterans who do desire to obtain veterans' insurance should be permitted to do so. My amendment provides for equity among veterans. It is a continuation of benefits that have already been provided. It is not a retraction, it is not a retrenchment and cutting back. My amendment would preserve benefits for future veterans which are presently existing in law.

I hope the amendment may be favorably considered by the House.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, of course this amendment would merely kill the bill.

Mr. EVINS. I disagree with the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. It was not offered in the committee, although the gentleman from Tennessee is on the committee and seconded the motion to report the bill out.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. ELLIOTT. As I understand the amendment I have just heard read, it was not offered before the subcommittee or the committee. The committee has had no opportunity to study it. In addition, it has what seems to me the fatal defect that it strikes out section 11, which preserves the integrity of the policies that were issued in World War I and World War II. I think the amendment is ill-considered and I regret that the gentleman from Tennessee has seen fit to offer it before first having it considered by the committee. The adoption of the amendment, would, in my judgment, greatly weaken this bill.

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEARNEY. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee is adopted, the whole purpose of this bill will be defeated.

Mr. RANKIN. That is right.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Is it not true that the veteran of World War I or the veteran of World War II who enjoys the privilege of reinstating his insurance paid premiums monthly while he was in the service?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes, sir; they did not get the benefit of this automatic insurance.

Here are some letters I have received from veterans' organizations approving this bill.

The first is from the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

It reads as follows:

JANUARY 24, 1951.

Re H. R. 1.

Hon. JOHN E. RANKIN,
Chairman, House Committee on Veterans' Affairs, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. RANKIN: I want to express the appreciation of the Veterans of Foreign Wars for the splendid work of the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs in connection with H. R. 1, which would provide a new approach to insurance coverage on the lives of all persons on active duty in the Armed Forces. I hope the House of Representatives will concur in the work of the Commitee and approve H. R. 1 as reported, without amendments.

I understand there is some sentiment in the Congress toward an amendment which would grant a period of 2 years after release from active duty in which ex-servicemen, not previously policyholders under NSLI, would be privileged to subscribe to national service life insurance. On the surface this would appear to be a reasonable proposition but experience in the past clearly indicates that at the end of the 2-year period there will be a demand for another period, etc. If it should be the intention of Congress to perpetuate national service life insurance for all persons who enter the Armed Forces there would be no purpose in adopting the gratuitous indemnity form of coverage. To those who sincerely believe that veterans should not be denied the right to subscribe to low-cost, subsidized Government insurance after leaving the service it should be pointed out that of some 20,000,000 policies issued during World War II, over 15,000,000 of said policies have been dropped.

It is the considered judgment of this office and the special insurance committee of our National Rehabilitation Service that the gratuitous indemnity coverage for all service personnel will provide equitable protection to all service personnel with a minimum of administrative red tape and far less cost to the Government than the current national service life insurance program.

Respectfully yours,
Omar B. Ketchum,
OMAR B. KETCHUM,
Director.

The next one is from the Disabled American Veterans. It reads as follows:

The Honorable JOHN E. RANKIN,
Chairman, Veterans' Affairs Committee, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. RANKIN: The Committee on Veterans' Affairs is to be congratulated upon favorably reporting the bill, H. R. 1, to authorize the payment of a gratuitous indemnity to survivors of members of the Armed Forces who die in active service. We of the DAV are hopeful the measure will be accepted by the House as reported because of its many desirable features; also because of the resultant vast savings in money and manpower to the Federal Government.

The Comptroller General has estimated that had a gratuitous indemnity program been in effect during the period 1940–49, the saving to the Government would have been approximately $587,000,000. Regarding necessary insurance personnel, the testimony in 1950 of the Veterans' Administration Insurance Administrator was that in time of emergency he thought "the manpower to operate an insurance system, projecting in the future, would probably not be available." He was then speaking about national service life insurance.

It might be pertinent to point out that since October 8, 1940, more than 22,500,000 NSLI policies have been issued. Three out of four of all former NSLI policyholders have permitted their policies to lapse. About 25.9 percent of NSLI policies now in force are carried by persons serving in the Armed Forces. Only 78 percent of those currently in the Armed Forces have taken out insurance. One out of every nine combat casualties of World War II had no national service life insurance whatsoever.

For the foregoing reasons, we of the DAV hope the House will pass H. R. 1 as reported by your committee, thus providing a complete insurance system to the members of our armed services at less cost to the Federal Government.

Very sincerely yours,
FRANCIS M. SULLIVAN,
National Legislative Director.

Then here is one from the AMVETS:

JANUARY 24, 1951.

Hon. JOHN RANKIN,
Chairman, House Veterans' Affairs Committee, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN RANKIN: AMVETS note with gratification that H. R. 1 is coming up for a vote in the House of Representatives on this date. Needless to say we are very happy that the Congress is seeing fit to consider this meritorious legislation. Many men in Korea today are without insurance protection due to the technical aspects of contractual relationships mandated by the Government insurance program. It is the sincere hope of our organization that Congress will pass H. R. 1 immediately.

AMVETS has for a considerable length of time favorably endorsed the theories set forth in H. R. 1. We believe that the bill carries out this Nation's obligations to its servicemen and to its veterans. In addition it will save this Government a considerable amount of money, and it will eliminate much of the red tape now existent in the Veterans' Administration.

The Assistant Administrator for insurance at the Veterans' Administration, Mr. Harold W. Breining, has testified that in the case of a national emergency it would be almost impossible to administer the present national service life insurance program. This, to us, seems to be enough evidence to warrant changing the system at once. However, change for the sake of change itself would not be in keeping with the expressed desires of the membership of this organization. We think that there are many other good reasons why H. R. 1 is good legislation:

1. It provides a universal coverage for all servicemen.

2. It is infinitely more simple to administer than the present unwieldy Government insurance programs.

3. The present program, if continued, could not be successfully administered in time of national emergency.

4. The present program is a costly item that is being tacked on to the cost of veterans' benefits, and we believe that if allowed to continue it will eventually affect the pension and compensation program as laid down by the Congress.

5. This new approach does not affect present policies issued under United States Government life insurance, nor under national service life insurance contracts.

6. All men disabled by reason of service to their country would be able to go into the national service life insurance program in the event that they were unable to obtain commercial coverage at normal premium-paying rates.

7. All men are protected for a reansonable time after the expiration of their service.

As you are aware, this matter has been studied extensively by the Hook Commission, by the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, and by the House Veterans' Affairs Committee. All of these agencies have recommended a proposal similar to H. R. 1. We believe therefore that it is self-evident that H. R. 1 should and must be passed.

We urge that you do everything possible to get the House of Representatives to act favorably on H. R. 1. It is our feeling that the bill should be passed as written without any amendments unless those amendments are necessary for clarification purposes.

Very truly yours,
HAROLD RUSSELL,
National Commander.

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am very greatly surprised at the turn that this matter has taken. I am not a member, of course, of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, but having served in the House for six terms I have viewed with amazement the fact that every year we pass legislation which treats the veterans of different wars in a different way. Every veteran here of the First World War, and I am one of them, knows that the Government has servicemen's life insurance, and that we have the right to keep that insurance up after we were discharged from the Army. I continued my Government insurance and it is now paid up. Everybody here knows as a practical matter that the Veterans' Administration has an office which looks after that insurance. We all know that the veterans of the Second World War were allowed to have servicemen's insurance. While it is true that this bill gives free insurance to these Korean veterans who do not have the right to take insurance, yet I see no reason in the world why we should not let those men take out servicemen's insurance on their release from duty if they want to do so and pay the premiums on it. If they are not allowed that right, then they will be getting different treatment from the veterans of the other two wars. As to the question of the excessive cost of administration I cannot understand that because the Government already has to keep an office to take care of the veterans who are carrying the insurance of the past two wars. We should not deny this right to these boys. It is said here that the private insurance companies will write the insurance for them cheaper than the Government. Everybody who has a policy with the Government knows that his insurance comes to him cheaper than it would if he had taken it out with one of the old-line life-insurance companies. We all know that. There is no argument about that.

So far as this amendment destroying the effect of this bill, I cannot understand that argument. This amendment makes it a better bill. I hope we will adopt this amendment and give these boys the right to take out the insurance.

Here is another reason why they should have it. The life-insurance companies give their policies on the basis of a strict medical examination. Many of these boys will not be able to get insurance in the old-line companies when they return. Many of them cannot get that insurance.

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield.

Mr. KEARNEY. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the provisions of the bill under which the soldiers will be able to take out national service life insurance.

Mr. CAMP. I think the provision of your bill is that if he has a disability which would grant him a pension, then he can take out the insurance. Does not your bill say that he must be 10 percent disabled?

Mr. RANKIN. No; it does not.

Mr. CAMP. All right. Then the bill only gives the right to take out the insurance to those who are disabled, is that right? Suppose a man comes out of the service and he is not disabled. Then you are treating him differently from the way the veterans of the other two wars are being treated. I think he should have the right to take out the insurance if he pays the premium for it. The premium charged for it is more than the cost of it. To illustrate that, the Government recently paid back huge dividends out of the profit they made on the servicemen's insurance. This thing would not cost the Government anything. Bear that in mind. These veterans have paid premiums for the insurance, and they should have that right.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield.

Mr. HARDY. With reference to the gentleman's statement that the premiums are more than the cost of the insurance, I am sure the gentleman is aware of the fact that the premiums do not pay any of the administrative costs and that is entirely paid by the Government.

Mr. CAMP. That is exactly the point I am making. I sat here and listened to your argument as well as the arguments of the other gentlemen. The Government will have to have an office and will have to have these men taking care of the insurance already taken out by the veterans of the other two wars and it will not take any additional cost. That argument, I think, is specious. I hope the House will give these boys the right to take out a policy when they come out of the service, just like the other boys have.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, what this amendment amounts to is that those who want to give them this national service life insurance right are willing to take all the benefits that would come to them under this bill, but they are also willing to cut any benefits to the American taxpayer that would come from this bill. "Take all that we can get and give us something else in addition to it. Do not worry about anybody else."

The basic benefit to be derived from this bill is to cut out the myriads of red tape, the unnecessary personnel that goes with the continuance, year after year, of the national service life insurance. When a man comes out of the service without any service-connected disability, he comes out as an able-bodied man. What more reason is there for furnishing that man with subsidized insurance for which he pays no part of the administration cost than there would be for setting up a commissary and furnishing him with his clothing and his food, or anything else that he might want, and have the Government pay for the administrative cost? If insurance is necessary to that man, so are his food and his clothing. The same argument that applies to giving him subsidized insurance would apply to any other necessity or convenience in his life.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. MORTON. Is it not true that our first obligation to the man who is fighting in Korea, and who we hope will come back here able-bodied, is to give him a country with a fiscal policy sound enough to preserve those things for which he is now fighting, and not yield to the pressure of the moment to some group that might favor some additional benefit?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. That I would say, plus freedom from the myriads of miles of red tape which would hamstring his Government so that Government could not continue to function.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. EVINS. The gentleman spoke of additional benefits. All we are going to do is to preserve and save the present benefits; not to cut back.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Let me answer that by saying this: That when we give increased and improved benefits to veterans of each succeeding war of this country, does the gentleman feel that there is an obligation, in addition to those improved benefits, to add thereto any benefits that any veteran has ever had in the history of the United States? I think that is about what the position of the gentleman amounts to.

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. In addition to giving complete coverage to every man in the service, the second basic reason for this bill was to eventually, someday, get the Government out of the insurance business.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. The gentleman is right.

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. And if we do not make a start here, we are just going to continue in the insurance business as much as ever.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. I think the gentleman is absolutely right. This bill protects every existing right that the veteran has.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. HARDY. There is no abridgment of any rights to any existing policy holder by the passage of this bill?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. That is correct.

Mr. HARDY. So that any holder of life insurance is completely protected?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. He loses no benefits.

Mr. HARDY. He has every right that he now has?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. That is correct.

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. CAMP. But he does not have the right to have servicemen's life insurance which the veteran of World War I and the veteran of World War II has, if the veteran wants to pay the premium?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. That is correct, but you completely ignore the fact that during the time he was in the service he pays nothing for the insurance. Those men who carried it during wartime had to pay substantial premiums on that policy during the time that they were in the service of our country.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. ALBERT. I was just going to suggest to the gentleman that members of the service in World War I and World War II did not have free insurance, either.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. They certainly did not.

Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will be voted down, because I consider that it would be losing a major portion of the benefit of this legislation were the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee to be adopted.

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Chairman, the indemnity provisions of H. R. 1 are certainly sound and desirable, but there should be added to this bill the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, which amendment would give to the veterans now in service the same opportunities to acquire national service life insurance that were given to those of us who served in World War II. Certainly we should make every effort to curtail unnecessary expenses, but this could be better done by eliminating farm subsidies and other currently unnecessary expenses instead of denying insurance benefits to the men and women in Korea who are unable to be here to speak for themselves, and who are not even allowed the option of deciding which they would prefer, indemnity or insurance.

The savings made by denying national service life insurance to those now serving in the Armed Forces will be negligible compared with what we could save the taxpayers by effective price control and elimination of some politically popular subsidies.

Some of the gentlemen opposed to the national service life insurance for present service men and women have pointed to the inefficiency of the Insurance Division of the Veterans' Administration. This inefficiency should be eliminated, even if we find it necessary to have the work done by contract with a private company. As a matter of fact, if private companies are willing, as some have said, to issue policies comparable with national service life insurance policies at the same premiums, it seems to me the gentlemen who wish to get the Government out of the insurance business by abolishing national service life insurance might very well consider asking private carriers to arrange to take over the risks and premiums of the existing insurance, instead of denying service men and women any opportunity at all to obtain national service life insurance in the future.

The gentlewoman from Massachusetts has predicted the adoption in the Senate of an amendment similar to the one proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, but we cannot be certain that the Senate will adopt such an amendment, and therefore we should do so here and now.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. EVINS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. EVINS) there were—ayes 14, noes 79.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no further amendments, under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1) to authorize the payment by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs of a gratuitous indemnity to survivors of members of the Armed Forces who die in active service, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 83, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 390, nays 0, not voting 44, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Mr. Durham with Mr. Canfield.
Mr. Wilson of Texas with Mr. Angell.
Mr. Anfuso with Mr. Wigglesworth.
Mr. Hébert with Mr. Taber.
Mr. Morrison with Mr. Budge.

Mr. King with Mr. Case.
Mr. Rabaut with Mr. Velde.
Mr. Dingell with Mr. Gillette.
Mr. Eberharter with Mr. Coudert.
Mr. Moulder with Mr. Scrivner.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

ORGANIZATION OF THE AIR FORCE

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1726) to provide for the organization of the Air Force and the Department of the Air Force, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 1726, with Mr. BATTLE in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the title of this bill pretty thoroughly expresses the purpose of the bill, which is to provide for organization of the Air Force, the Department of the Air Force, and for other purposes. This is a counterpart of the bill which we had here in the last Congress for the statutory organization of the Army.

First, let me point out some things that this bill does not do: It does not in any way increase or diminish the personnel strength of the Air Force, either the officer personnel or the enlisted personnel. I make this point because I found before the Rules Committee that I did not make that strong enough and some were of the opinion that it increased the number of higher-ranking officers of the Air Force; it does not do so.

The Air Force, of course, is a new organization, having been separated from the Army by the so-called Unification Act, the National Security Act of 1947.

The Army has been in existence for many, many years. Over a period of 150 years through historical organization, through tradition, and through legislation it had acquired a very rigid statutory organization. The organization existing for the Army on a permanent basis was the organization provided in the National Defense Act of 1916 as amended in 1921.

The organizational set-up by statute, as I said, was very rigid, separating the Army into branches, services, departments, and corps. The Air Force became a separate organization; it became so under the National Security Act which was reported to the House by the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and not by either of the committees which for a long period of time had handled legislation affecting the armed services. Thus, other than those provisions for organization which the Air Force took with them from the Army, practically the only permanent law with reference to Air Force organization is that there shall be an Air Force, a Secretary of the Air Force, and a Chief of Staff who shall command the same.

In this bill we do not intend to impose the rigid type of organization upon the Air Force which the Army has had in the past; thus the approach, in considering the Air Force bill and the Army bill—they were considered by the same subcommittee of the Committee on Armed Services—was completely opposite. The purpose in the Army organization bill was to relieve the Army from many of the rigid controls as to organization and administration which had previously affected it. The approach to this, inasmuch as the Air Force has very few laws controlling it, was to exercise the constitutional obligation and duty of the Congress to provide legislative authority and a legislative policy as to the organization of the Air Force.

It sets out in brief a codification of the system under which the Air Force is presently operated, making very few changes, the principal one I propose to mention specifically as we consider the bill. It follows pretty generally the definitions such as we have affecting the Army. It provides, of course, for a Secretary, an Under Secretary, and Assistant Secretaries of the Air Force, and it provides for the first time an Air Staff.

The General Staff system of the Army was set up in 1903 by law. There is no such law as to the Air Force, although the Air Force has had from time to time, separated from the Army, an Air Staff as distinguished from the Army General Staff. It is called the Air Staff. For the first time by law we authorize the Air Staff.

We also provide for a Chief of Staff, a Vice Chief of Staff, not to exceed five Deputy Chiefs of Staff, and such other members of the Air Force and such civilian officers and employees in or under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Air Force as may be assigned or detailed under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Air Force. The important place where we have changed the statutory organization of the Air Force is as to the command of the Air Force by the Chief of Staff.

The National Security Act of 1947 provides that the Chief of Staff shall command the Air Force. The Chief of Staff of the Army does not and has never had command of the Army. He has had supervision of the Army. In the Navy the Chief of Naval Operations does not command the Navy. The Chief of Naval Operations commands the operating forces of the Navy. This is of very considerable importance, although first it may seem to be a play on words. Our bill provides for supervision and not command. The Army Chief of Staff has supervision, not command.

In other words, in conformity with our system of government as provided in the Constitution, it is the view of our committee that no individual, no professional military individual, should be permitted to command the entire military force, whether it be the Army, Navy, or Air Force. The command of the Armed Forces of the United States is by the Constitution vested in the President of the United States. He is the Commander in Chief. So that no individual should be permitted to command the entire Army, the entire Navy, or the entire Air Force. There is no objection to a military man commanding any given segment of any one of the three services, but in the over-all command of all it should be the President as provided in the Constitution. This bill, throughout, preserves civilian control of the Air Force; so does the bill organizing the Army and organizing the Navy. The President, the Secretary of Defense, and the Secretary of the particular service are in general supervision of the Military Establishment, and they always come ahead of the military. That preserves the type of government that we have organized in the United States from the beginning.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish the gentleman would kindly explain to the Committee the provision on page 5, paragraph (c). Some of the Members are in doubt as to exactly what that means, and I am sure the gentleman can explain it so that it has no hidden meaning or derogatory effect if the bill is passed.

Mr. KILDAY. The gentleman means if he is acting as Secretary of the Air Force, "section 1222, Revised Statutes (10 U. S. C. 576) shall not apply to him by reason of his temporary performing such duties"?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes. It is the same provision as has been in effect with reference to the Army; in other words, if a catastrophe happens and the Secretaries are all killed, then the President could temporarily appoint the Chief of Staff as the Secretary of the Air Force.

Mr. KILDAY. The purpose of the exception to the Revised Statutes is to protect the Chief of Staff's appointment as Chief of Staff. Otherwise, upon assuming the office temporarily he would be affected by the section of the Revised Statutes which prohibits an officer from holding a civil office while on the active list. I understand some have raised the question of having the Chief of Staff appear in line of succession with the civilian Secretary, Under Secretary, and Assistant Secretaries. That is nothing new in our military system. As a matter of fact, it seldom happens, but it has occasionally happened that the Chief of Staff of the Army has functioned as Acting Secretary of War. I do not believe it has happened since we have had the Secretary of the Army. General Craig, perhaps General Marshall—but I am sure General Craig served as Acting Secretary of War. In that one place we have a slight deviation from the civilian control, of which I was speaking. It is one place that seems to be lax, but it is in accordance with traditions and history. It has presented no difficulty in the past, but on the contrary, on occasion, has been found to be helpful and convenient.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it not a fact that all this law does is to codify the practices that the Air Force has been administering for the last 20 years; ever since they were established?

Mr. KILDAY. I want to emphasize that it is a codification of the system already existing in the Air Force. For 20 years? I cannot say that, because we did not have a complete separation until the National Security Act of 1947. In that respect there is this distinction—the bill does not create any separate corps in the Air Force. The Army has many corps, departments, and branches that have been set up, and they have come down through the years. The Air Force has never been organized that way. It has had a more elastic organization from the time it was separated from the Army, and we preserve that situation here. There is no separate corps. Of course, it was suggested that there should be. Testimony was given and witnesses appeared suggesting that a separate Judge Advocate General Corps be provided for the Air Force. That is not done by this bill. In one respect, however, it departs from the general formula of the bill. It provides that the Judge Advocate General of the Air Force shall be a permanent major general. I said we did not create any new general grades. Well, we did not. The Judge Advocate General now is a major general, but he is not a permanent major general. He has a spot promotion as major general while acting as Judge Advocate General. It is the view of the committee that it would probably be better to make him a permanent major general to lessen any suspicion of control over him by the commanding officers of the Air Force in discharging his function in connection with the administration of military justice. It provides that he be a permanent major general, so he is not going to be looking to promotion or fear any reduction.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. In the bill as it is now written it does not provide that the Judge Advocate General be a lawyer. However, it is my understanding that another act does make that provision; is that correct?

Mr. KILDAY. Yes; in the Uniform Code of Military Justice. Of course, he has to be a lawyer.

The other provisions with respect to the Judge Advocate General are to integrate the Air Force into the uniform code of military justice which was adopted in the last Congress and which becomes effective on the 31st day of May this year. It is to make sure that those things to be done by the Judge Advocate General under that code come within the jurisdiction of the Judge Advocate General of the Air Force.

The other principal provision is that we create by statute three commands that we specify as major commands. They are the Air Defense Command, the Strategic Air Command, and the Tactical Air Command. These are all combat forces. The three major commands created by the statute are all combat forces.

There is another provision that authorizes such other commands, organizations, and forces as may from time to time be established by the Secretary of the Air Force. Of course, now you have the training command, the matériel command, and others. Thus there may be other commands, but they are not specified as major commands. The major commands are the three combat commands.

We thought it was very important that we stress these three commands; one of the greatest reasons being that we wanted Congress to emphasize that we wanted these strategic and tactical forces built up and maintained, the emphasis being on the tactical command as well as the strategic command, and then the air-defense command, which is, of course, for the defense of our own country; so we have the three major fighting commands.

Then the bill provides that the country can be divided into various areas, for the purpose of command.

It may be that as time goes on we are going to find it necessary to impose a more rigid organization upon the Air Force. We feel that at this time, while it is in its formative period, it should not be too rigidly controlled, that experience should be permitted to develop, so we will know just where additional organization is necessary. That controlled us a great deal in providing only the three major commands by statute, and then setting up other or less important commands by administrative procedure in the department.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. Would the gentleman be kind enough to place in the RECORD, unless he happens to know exactly what it is now, the provisions of section 203? We want to have in the RECORD how many lieutenant generals will be permitted in this new Air Force.

Mr. KILDAY. The Air Force is authorized 13 permanent lieutenant generals and 4 permanent four-star generals.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the bill is adequate for the purposes, and, under existing circumstances, as far as we should go in discharging our obligation to formulate the military policy and the legislative policy for the armed services. We should take this step at this time.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I just want to thank the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY] for the full and comprehensive report on the bill presently before us. There seems to be no opposition. There was no opposition in the Committee on Armed Services in reporting this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time, and yield back the balance of the time on this side of the aisle.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PRIEST].

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this minute in order to make an announcement as requested by the majority leader. The majority leader has instructed me to say for the information of the Members of the House that after the conclusion of this bill, there is no further legislative program for this week. The House, of course, will meet tomorrow, when it is hoped that we may be able to adjourn over until Monday. There is no legislative program for tomorrow.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL].

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Chairman, and ladies and gentlemen of the Committee of the Whole, I want to thank the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY] for this opportunity of rising and explaining my position. During the 6 years that I have been in the House I have always offered an antisegregation amendment to every bill that has come before us pertaining to the Armed Forces. I rise today to state that I will not do this during the period now—the period when we are at war. The thing that is important to us now is victory, victory at all costs, except the cost of losing our civil liberties.

During the 6 years that I have fought for the abolition of segregation in the Armed Forces, step by step we have seen great improvement; and I am happy to state today that men of my racial group are serving with great distinction and courage in the Korean conflict. Before the Korean conflict Paul Robeson said that Negro people would not take up arms against Soviet Russia. The very next morning I stood in the well of this House and said that Paul Robeson was not stating the truth concerning the peoples of my group, that when the call to arms came, we would answer the same as anyone else, as they always have done. Time has proven that I was correct. Already the Congressman from Massachusetts [Mr. LANE] has told this House of the courage of the Twenty-fourth Infantry, and the heroic stand that they took, which helped to give us our first victory in the Korean conflict.

I have before me an article concerning Lieutenant Wynn, of North Carolina. The article is as follows:

[From the Pittsburgh Courier]

NEGRO OFFICER'S ACTION UNEQUALED IN MILITARY HISTORY

(By Alex M. Rivera, Jr.)

DURHAM, N. C.—Will Lt. Ellison Wynn of the baker company of the second division receive the Nation's highest decoration, the Congressional Medal of Honor?

Twice wounded in the Korean fighting zone, Lieutenant Wynn, of Durham, N. C., is now recovering at an Army hospital in Osaka, Japan, for action which an authoritative Army historian has described as "perhaps unequaled in American military history."

A baker in a Durham hospital before he volunteered for Korean combat duty, Lieutenant Wynn, who is married and the father of two small daughters, distinguished himself as leader of an integrated unit of white and Negro fighting men.

Col. L. S. A. Marshall, the Army's roving efficiency expert on Infantry operations in Korea, picked Wynn's unit "as possibly the bravest in the action."

Wynn's wife, Mrs. Meneva Wynn, of 1205 Fifth Avenue, Durham, told this reporter who was one of Wynn's high school classmates, that her husband "has been badly hit by mortar fire." It has been learned that the right side of Wynn's face was virtually blown away. Plastic surgery is being considered for him.

WYNN AND THE CONGRESSIONAL MEDAL

Colonel Marshall has said of the action of the mixed white and Negro unit under Wynn's command: "That company's stand was perhaps unequaled in American military history. It entered action with 125 men and withdrew only on regimental orders with its tail fighting like hell 24 hours later with only 34 men not wounded."

The company commander, Capt. William C. Wallace, Petersburg, Va., was wounded in the first hour of battle and his executive officer, Lieutenant Wynn, led the company for the next 24 hours.

"Get the picture," Marshall said. "The commanding officer from Virginia, a Negro second in command and two noncoms, Cpl. Donald Crawford (South Boston, Va.) and Sgt. Laurence C. Smith, Jr. (Sandstone, Va.) distinguished themselves along with Wynn."

Marshall said that the fighting at close quarters was so savage that there were reported instances of fist fighting between Americans and Chinese. He added that neither in the Pacific nor European campaigns of World War II did "I find a division that fought with more gallantry than the Second."

Marshall compiled the detailed histories of 16 companies of the Ninth, Twenty-third and Thirty-eighth Infantry Regiments during their furious week-long battle and withdrawal from Kujangdong south to Suchon last month.

Marshall is chief editorial writer of the Detroit News and a former Army historian of World War II.

May I further quote from this newspaper concerning Lt. Harry E. Sutton, of the Bronx:

SAVED BEACHHEAD—LIEUTENANT, HIS PLATOON HUNGNAM HEROES

HUNGNAM, KOREA.—Leonidas, the intrepid Spartan at Thermopylae, found his twentieth century counterpart on the ever-tightening UN beachhead here at this beleaguered port early on the morning of December 18. He was First Lt. Harry E. Sutton of the Bronx, N. Y., who, with his platoon, stood off frenzied Chinese attacks and saved every UN soldier on this beachhead.

Only Lieutenant Sutton and his little platoon of heroic Negro doughboys stood between the Reds and the Sea of Japan, into which the Reds are trying to drive the UN forces. If Lieutenant Sutton's platoon had yielded the end would have been written then and there to the saga of the allied evacuation from North Korea. He did not yield.

ATTACKED BEFORE DAWN

Starting before dawn on that subzero Monday morning in banzai yells of charging Chinese, the sound of their blowing bugles and their fanatic battering away at the position held by Lieutenant Sutton, were the signals for the beginning of one more epic stand in the annals of military history.

From early dawn Monday until Tuesday afternoon, Lieutenant Sutton led his men to attack and counterattack, and the blood of Chinese soldiers reddened the white snow atop the triple ridges over which Sutton had strung out his weary, grimy, half-frozen men. Before the day was ended, allied officers had added a new name to the long list made famous by gallant stands: Sutton's Ridge, they called the triple hills.

INCESSANT WAVES

Repeatedly the Chinese threw themselves in incessant waves against the valiant band of Negro soldiers who calmly loaded and reloaded their M1 rifles and Browning automatic rifles and fired again and again into the oncoming human waves. They wrote a brilliant story of heroism here on Hungnam's beachhead which will live forever in the minds of the thousands of UN troops who are living today because these Negro soldiers said: "They shall not pass." For the Chinese did not pass.

Lieutenant Sutton's platoon was assigned to hold a long three-humped ridge as part of the port defenses of the United States Third Infantry Division, on the eastern flank of the beachhead. The Reds—Chinese and North Koreans—were on the next ridge line over the Negro GI's. At 7:45 Monday morning they struck. They hit Sutton's position with everything they had.

OLD-FASHIONED FIGHTING

Moving back and forth in World War I trench fashion, Sutton and his men picked the Reds off as they came with a cross-fire. "But they just kept coming," Lieutenant Sutton said later, "All day they kept hitting us in small groups. We would wipe out one bunch, and before we knew it another bunch was coming in."

The Reds tried to pin down Sutton and his men with heavy fire, so they could rush the entrenchments. Sutton's men brought all their firepower into play in return. The Reds were using captured American rifles and machine guns in this attack.

Brilliant individual examples of heroism stood out. Facing the Reds head-on, Master Sgt. Tyler Collins, of Malone, Fla., stood upright and picked off seven Reds, one by one, as they rushed in, cooly disregarding their frantic fire. One bazooka man in the platoon fired one burst at the Reds and his single shot killed ten of them. Around 7 o'clock Monday evening, the Reds eased their attack.

Two hours later they broke loose again and Lieutenant Sutton and his men went back into action facing a new type of attack from the Reds. They had altered their tactics and were using sniper style attacks. These kept up all through the long, cold night.

NEW ATTACKS

At 6 a. m Tuesday, the Reds threw a wall of fire at the center of Sutton's ridge, as the spot was now known. A suicide attack was thrown at Lieutenant Sutton's left flank. But the intrepid platoon then got some help—for the first time in the fray. It came from the massed fire of United States artillery to the rear on the shrinking beachhead. Sutton's men fought from trench to foxholes as the Reds attacked again and again. But the Reds couldn't break through.

Had they broken through, they would have gone straight through to the sea of Japan. Some Reds managed to get into Sutton's lines, but he and his men killed them off as fast as they got in. After-battle examination showed that some of the Reds had morphine on their persons, indicating that they might have come into the battle doped. One Negro GI was found dead beneath the bodies of two Reds; he had killed them both.

KNOCKED OUT MG

Pfc. Elijah Whitley, of Toledo, Ark., used his BAR to put a Red machine gun out of action just as the Reds had gotten it into place along the ridge line. When all was over, Reds were strewn over the snowclad hillsides in all kinds of crazy positions. They had failed to take the position held by Lieutenant Sutton and his men.

Lieutenant Sutton, a veteran of the Pacific in World War II, and with some 10 years of Army experience behind him, said he had never seen anything like it before. "I'm proud of my men," he said. "We're proud of the lieutenant," said the men; "he was great."

And then came the most startling revelation of all: When the Reds finally gave up their attack, every man in his platoon was down to his very last clip of .30 caliber ammunition for their M1 rifles.

The New York Times of Friday, December 22, 1950, further supports the Pittsburgh Courier article on Lieutenant Sutton, with a press release from the Associated Press:

NEGRO UNIT HAILED ON HUNGNAM STAND—PLATOON LED BY BRONX OFFICER STAVED OFF MOST SERIOUS THREAT TO BEACHHEAD

WITH UNITED STATES THIRD DIVISION IN KOREA, December 20.—A gallant Negro infantry platoon fought off the most threatening approach yet to a Communist break-through into the Hungnam beachhead.

The United States unit was led by Lt. Harry E. Sutton, of 1100 Franklin Avenue, the Bronx, N. Y., when the North Koreans made their wild charge.

The Red assault disintegrated when each United States soldier was down to his last ammunition clip of eight bullets. That's how close the Communists came to penetrating at least the outer United Nations defense ring.

The savage battle of "Sutton's Ridge" began before dawn Monday. The United States counter-attack ended Tuesday noon.

Since then the United States troops have shifted positions. The story now can be told without endangering security.

A famous Third Division regiment was holding part of the hilly eastern flank of the beachhead. Lieutenant Sutton's platoon was assigned to a long, three-humped ridge.

Lieutenant Sutton has been a soldier a long time and an infantry lieutenant 5 years. He spotted his men in strong points on the three ridge nipples and along the World War I type trenches that civilian workers had gouged in the frozen earth.

He was worried. Fresh North Korean soldiers—reorganized, reequipped, and fanatic—were on the next ridge line over. On his right flank they had strongpointed a hill that surrounding crags masked from United States artillery.

At 7:45 a. m., Monday, the Communists struck. Crawling up the bare windswept ridge came 3 groups of 20 men—1 group on each flank, 1 dead center. Just a small attack, but made by ferocious men who would not stop even when wounded.

The United States soldiers moved back and forth in their old-fashioned trench, picking off the Reds.

"But they kept coming and coming, Lieutenant Sutton said. "All day small groups of them kept coming. We would wipe out this bunch, and before we knew it the Reds were back again."

The Communists from the ridge line opposite tried to pin down Lieutenant Sutton's men with fire so the assault groups could reach the trench line. The Reds were firing captured United States Browning automatic rifles, machine guns, and Garand rifles.

Master Sgt. Tyler Collins, of Malone, Fla., stood bolt upright and picked off seven Communists. A bazooka man killed 10 with a single shell. But the Reds kept coming for more than 11 hours. Finally at 7 p. m. there was a break.

"We have licked them," the GI's told each other jubilantly.

But 2 hours later the snarl of small arms began again from the opposite ridge. There was no assault this time, just the continual bark of snipers' rifles through the long, frigid night.

REDS ATTACK ANEW AFTER HALT

At 6 a. m. Tuesday the Reds assaulted "Sutton Ridge." From the ridge opposite the center of the line came a fierce wall of fire.

A suicide enemy force struck up the slope against the left flank.

Lieutenant Sutton was not too worried about these two fronts—the massed firepower of United States artillery could hit there.

But from the hill on the right—masked from the guns by the other hills—the main force of the enemy was assaulting in the darkness. The Reds were coming down a precipitous slope, tying short fiber ropes on scrub pines and lowering themselves.

With flashing bayonets they burst into the strong point on the last of the three nipples on Lieutenant Sutton's ridge. The GI's there fought desperately. Later, in one fox hole, Lieutenant Sutton found two dead North Koreans and the body of the United States soldier who had killed them before he died.

Once inside the trenches the Reds turned the United States soldiers' own machine gun down the ridge line.

Pfc Elijah Whitley, of Toledo, Ark., replied with his Browning automatic rifle, silencing the machine gun. Along the ridge line Lieutenant Sutton and his men rolled hand grenades down the slope. In the breaking dawn they could see the Communists crumple and tumble down the slope and then see new men replace them. Bodies were strewn crazily on the slopes.

May I also call the attention of the House to the article in Collier's magazine, January 13, 1951, on Sgt. Arthur Dudley, of Florida:

FOURTH SQUAD, THIRD PLATOON

(By Bill Stapleton)

(Officers watching him in action called Sgt. Arthur C. Dudley "the best damn squad leader in Korea." And his men, American and Korean, had one thing in common; respect for their Negro sarge.)

KOREA.—Coming down from the Nineteenth Infantry Regiment's front-line positions on the bleak hill that rose behind the battalion command post, Sgt. (1c) Arthur Charles Dudley led the seven men into the farmyard. They had been visible for about 10 minutes. All walked with the tired step of the veteran infantryman. All were hunched against the bitter, stinging cold of the North Korea winter.

Sergeant Dudley was apologetic about the absence of Guido. He explained to the battalion commander: "We were diggin' in on the hill last night when the han' grenade that Guido had in his pocket went off. Guess it hit his shovel or something. Anyway, we got him evacuated and I think he's gonna be O. K. It didn't kill him. It jest tore up his leg some."

The other members of the squad watched Dudley intently as he talked. Obviously, the sergeant had won high respect and admiration from men who admire top leadership in a very tough profession.

Guido. Corp. Guido Schoentrup, aged 25, assistant squad leader, home town, Indianapolis, had been Sergeant Dudley's strong right arm. They all missed him.

A GARAND WITH MANY NOTCHES

Guido had been there when the legends began to grow about the now famous international squad, led by the deadliest of rifle marksmen—a Negro sergeant who could count at least 53 enemy dead on the butt of his Garand, and whom I heard referred to respectfully by war-weary senior officers as "the best damn squad leader in Korea."

Word of Sergeant Dudley and his international squad had first reached me at the Chongchon River front, where I was photographing combat operations for Collier's. The stories of the unit's achievements in action impressed me, of course. But there was more to it than that. It seemed to me their importance was inescapable: The squad was a heart-warming and dramatic symbol of cooperation and mutual respect among freemen fighting for a common cause. I felt I had to find them; know them. That's how I came to be waiting at the command post.

Sergeant Dudley saluted his battalion officer, turned to his squad, and said in a soft southern voice that could also crackle with military authority when necessary, "Let it rest, children." He motioned them to a bonfire in the corner of the farmyard.

The squad—Jennings, Smith, Jesse, Sparks, Jones, Chief, and Miller—rested.

For the record, the full names: Corp. Elmer D. Jennings, 18, of Hillsville, Va.; Corp. Clifford H. Smith, 20, of Detroit, Mich.; Pvt. Kim Sung (Jesse) Duk, 19, of Haman, Korea; Pfc Carlton F. Sparks, 18, of Marion, N. C.; Pvt. Un Kae (Jones) Pyong, 22, of Taegu, Korea; Pvt. Im Chong (Chief) Myung, 28, of Taegu, Korea, and Pfc James H. Miller, 19, of Iron City, Ga.

Heavy artillery—big stuff, outgoing—crumped into the nearby enemy country, but the front was quiet. A pig in the farmyard rooted noisily and one of the squad threw a rock at him.

Sergeant Dudley thumbed through a short personal record of his little outfit, the smallest unit of command in the Army.

His record of the lives of his men was written neatly enough on a page in the center fold of a parachutist's logbook. The book, picked up off the ground at Fort Benning, Ga., last year, was small enough to fit in the corner of Dudley's wallet.

Some of the names were misspelled.

A name, Pfc Frank Brandt, carried the notation—with ROK's. A name, Pfc Herschel Wallingham—gone to platoon. A name, Pvt. Tony Ramirez—bad feet, transferred.

The squad, in such quiet moments, didn't talk about the war, the United Nations or the big picture. They didn't care.

They remembered, instead, that Sergeant Dudley owed the squad a Coke a day for every day that the war lasted beyond September 19. Dudley had predicted the war would be over by then and they'd all go back to Japan. The Coke bet was important. They needled him about it, in wry humor.

As they spoke of getting back to Japan, as some might speak of getting back to the United States, these cold, weary men pointed up their occasional terrible homesickness for security and peace. Japan was closer.

Dudley invited everyone to Florida after the war to bask in the warm sunshine near his home at Warrington, near Pensacola. Even the Korean boys understood what this talk meant and they smiled in appreciation.

Twenty-eight-year-old Arthur C. Dudley entered service at Camp Blanding, Florida, October 7, 1942. He was a draftee, leaving a job in a paper pulp mill at Marianna, Fla. He was assigned to Camp Hood, Texas, for training with the armored forces and sailed for Europe with the Eight Hundred and Twenty-seventh Tank Destroyer Battalion. He served in France, Germany, and Austria. After three re-enlistments, he was a career soldier, intending to become an ordnance expert.

But in Korea, shivering in the bone-chilling winds that whistled out of Manchuria 60 miles away, he thought a lot of home, his wife, Hattie, and their two daughters, Yvonne and Sheila, aged 4 and 5 years.

Private First Class Miller, youngest of the squad and assistant BAR gunner, was very apparently proud of his leader.

"Tell 'em how you picked off that gook at that long range, Sergeant Dudley." He turned to the rest of the squad. Chief grinned in appreciation.

DUDLEY'S VERSION OF THE SHOOTING

The squad leader shifted his seat around the fire to include all of the group:

"Like I've told you people before, know your rifle. It wasn't too much. It was pretty long range. I fired once, noticed where the dust kicked up near this guy, then I raised my sights a hair and got him. I don't know where it hit him, but it killed him."

They measured it later. The range was 1,300 yards. (According to the Army, the rifle is accurate up to 1,200 yards.) Maybe it was easy for a sharpshooting hunter who used to strike matches with a .22 when he was 11 years old.

Corporal Jennings, the bazookaman, chimed in, saying, "The sergeant doesn't ever say much."

The rest of the men nodded slowly, their heads bobbing under steel helmets blackened by use in heating water and cooking.

"That's the truth," said Corporal Smith. "He never does say much."

The Department of the Army said it for Sergeant Dudley in General Orders, No. 110, dated October 11, 1950. They awarded him the Distinguished Service Cross for extraordinary heroism.

Headquarters Eighth Army gave him the medal, the Nation's second highest military award, in recognition of his services during the action at Ch'ang-nyong. The action took place over a 5-day period, August 2–7. Dudley, a new replacement for Baker Company, first joined the unit on the 3d of August, reporting in during the heat of the battle.

During fighting at the Naktong River, Sergeant Dudley personally eliminated 50 enemy riflemen, after first exposing himself, to draw fire.

The Army, in military language, says, "Men were exhausted and were subject to harassing fire, particularly from enemy snipers and automatic weapons. The company was at half strength, having taken severe casualties over a period of weeks."

Dudley was also commended for his action on August 7 when he unjammed a machine gun for a worried gunner, again under heavy enemy fire. Later the same day, he was wounded and evacuated, under protests from Dudley that he be allowed to stay with his squad.

THE SERGEANT IS WOUNDED

Sergeant Dudley was hit—mortar fragments in the right leg and arm—and was hospitalized for 12 days, after which he immediately rejoined his unit.

That was where most of the squad caught it. They all spoke of the battle positions there as "the Notch."

Smith got knocked flat and was later hospitalized for concussion from another mortar shell.

Miller watched in some amazement as the bipod legs of his automatic rifle were shot away during one frenzied charge by the enemy.

A boy by the name of Oldamaker or Oldemeyer from Indiana got knocked out by blast concussion and didn't rejoin the squad. No one remembered his first name.

And, the squad remembered, a Spanish kid from Texas got killed outright from a sniper's bullet.

"Hand grenades flew like baseballs," Jennings recalled.

Just then a jeep courier whizzed into the command post and two bundled-up riders hurried into the thatched farmhouse. A field telephone nearby rang and the soldier who answered it said "Doughboy Red."

We couldn't hear the conversation.

Sergeant Dudley picked up again. "I came out here originally as a replacement soldier for the Twenty-fifth Division, but we got kinda mixed up and the Twenty-fourth needed the replacements quicker, I guess. So we came here."

The sergeant paused to listen to Jennings and Sparks argue over where they had been.

Miller said, "We could tell you better if we could remember some of these little old towns, but most of 'em end in Yong or Dong, and how can you remember anything from that?"

He stopped talking to accept a roasted corncob from Jesse, the Korean ammunition carrier, and began to munch it.

The South Koreans assigned to the squad never spoke of one another by their right, or native names. Instead, they used the nicknames given them by the Americans, even when talking among themselves.

The conversation on the field telephone was terminated by the soldier, who said, "Okay, I'll tell him."

Sergeant Dudley said, "You know this figure of 53 dead gooks? Well, I have a quota of 75. Me and a boy named Gant in Charlie Company got a bet on. I'm way ahead of him now, but maybe I'll fill my quota before this war's over.

"These Chinese boys we're running up against are pretty good fighters. You can't see them. They take advantage of all the cover and they fight like real trained soldiers, not like the North Koreans."

Chief spat into the fire.

Jennings spoke up: "We've got a pretty wonderful squad here and we couldn't have a much better leader than what we have. He always tells the new guys that we're like a chain and that we aren't any better than our weakest link. We always dig our fox holes that way. Like a chain, in a way."

Sparks said it should be put in the story that Sergeant Dudley didn't go to sleep some nights until he was sure the squad was O. K.

The interview time was going fast.

THEY TALK MOSTLY OF THEIR FAMILIES

Sergeant Dudley stood up and so did his squad. "We ain't got much more to say. Usually we jest sit around and talk about our families. We don't know a lot about this war."

He picked up his rifle and walked out on the pathway to the hills. Pfc. Carlton Sparks, of Marion, N. C., helped Pvt. Un Kae Pyong, of Taegu, Korea, put on his pack. The rest of the squad quietly, almost automatically, fell into a line.

Sparks said, "We don't worry about talking to the Korean guys. Chief has a list of words we use most and he's studying on it."

Everyone looked at Sergeant Dudley. "Let's move out," he said softly and they swung down the path, away from the farmyard and toward the frowning hill. The artillery started up again.

Away from the command post, to the left, was a battered cornfield and the line stopped there to wave back. You could see Sergeant Dudley plainly, even though he was at the head of the small column. He was standing on something and his face was outlined against the whitening cornstalks. He stood out clearly.

Now, I not only want to call attention to the bravery of these men and their troops and others unknown, but I want to say that I believe effective action should be taken to see that a Congressional Medal of Honor is issued to either one or all three of these highly praised heroes.

I further want to point out that Lieutenant Wynn, of North Carolina, and Sergeant Dudley, of Florida, were the officers in charge of mixed groups of Negro and white troops. Segregation is vanishing in the Armed Forces.

Before June 25, the Korean conflict, my aim was the abolition of segregation in the Armed Forces, and my record for 6 years substantiates that, but now we are at war and we must win. We must not give aid and comfort to our enemies, and on the other hand we must not lose any vestige of democracy that we have already won. In fact, we must go forward.

Personally, during this session of Congress, I intend to press for all civil-rights bills and intend to fight, by the way of amendments, for increased democracy on the home front. I intend to support during this war every single piece of legislation aimed at victory for our way of life. For the duration only, I will not offer any antisegregation bills as amendments to bills pertaining to the Military Establishment as long as progress continues and there are no violations of the order abolishing segregation.

I leave all this now in the hands of the Commander in Chief, our President, Mr. Truman. He can by Executive order abolish any form of segregation that may still be left or any that does creep out. However, if there are any flagrant abuses, if there are any cases where segregation and discrimination do come to the forefront, then I will fight the slightest injustice and if this injustice continues as a pattern, then I will be forced to come back to this floor and again raise the issue. I wish to serve notice, however, that I will in every way fight a universal military training bill because I am against it for many reasons, not only from the standpoint of establishing a permanent pattern of segregation, but from other standpoints as well.

I want to finally conclude with a letter which came to me from Mr. James Evans, the civilian assistant to the Secretary of Defense, and I think that this will help shape up our entire problem.

(The letter is as follows:)

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D. C., January 10, 1951.

Hon. ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, Jr.,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. POWELL: We are furnishing herewith an account of the heroic service of Lt. Harry E. Sutton, of the Bronx, and his platoon on the Hungnam beachhead.

We are also enclosing press releases of current Medal of Honor awards with the thought that these may assist with the representations which you propose to make in asking that the Medal of Honor be bestowed upon Lieutenant Sutton.

I am advised by some of our high-ranking officers, who are thoroughly familiar with the matter under consideration, that nothing in these commendations surpasses the achievements of Lieutenant Sutton. It is to be noted that he is alive where many others have lost their lives in undertaking similar heroic actions.

We greatly need an outstanding, live, active Negro hero to symbolize the heroic sacrifices and accomplishments of all our men in the Far East. Lieutenant Sutton and his outfit are outstanding in this regard. Permit us to commend for your attention also the achievements of Sgt. (1c) Arthur Charles Dudley as set forth in the January 13, 1951, issue of Collier's magazine, pages 9–11.

Permit me to treat further the seriousness of our need in this connection. I am enclosing copies of an extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Eighty-first Congress which pertains to a statement by Congressman LANE, of Massachusetts, on some of the exploits of the Twenty-fourth Infantry Regiment. Following this account, the Twenty-fourth achieved further distinction in spearheading a successful movement to the east and west and north. At the same time, there were splendid accounts of outstanding achievement on the part of our officers and men who were functioning in integrated units and otherwise performing their military duties without regard to race.

* * * * *

On the alert as you always are, you can greatly serve our men in the service by taking up where others left off months ago and restore Lieutenant Sutton and all who he typifies to their rightful place before those who so greatly need bases for encouragement and inspiration.

I would assume that you will receive additional specific aid in this matter through the Chief of Legislative Liaison, Department of the Army, but I hope that you will call upon us for such further details as you may consider essential.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES C. EVANS,
Civilian Assistant to the Secretary of Defense.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWELL. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Did the gentleman cite that instance where the Negro flier was shot down, and was seen in the plane by a white man who saved him?

Mr. POWELL. I do not think I have that item, but I would be happy to include that with my remarks.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That shows there is not anywhere near as much discrimination when the chips are down as some folks seem to think.

Mr. POWELL. That is what I am pointing out in my speech. The War Department records show that Negro and white troops are fighting side by side in Korea, some commanded by Negroes and some by whites in every phase of our Armed Forces.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.—

SHORT TITLE

SEC. 1. This act may be cited as the "Air Force Organization Act of 1951."

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Sec. 1. Short title of act.
Sec. 2. Definitions.
Title I. Secretary, Under Secretary, and Assistant Secretaries of the Air Force.
Title II. Chief of Staff and the Air Staff.
Title III. Composition and organization of the Air Force.
Title IV. Repeals, amendments, and saving provisions.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 2. As used in this act—

(a) The terms "United States Air Force" and "Air Force" are synonymous and mean the United States Air Force established by the National Security Act of 1947, and said terms include the components and persons prescribed in section 301 of this act.

(b) The term "members of the Air Force" means all persons appointed, enlisted, or inducted in, or transferred to, any of the components of the Air Force; all persons appointed, enlisted, or inducted in, or transferred to the Air Force without specification of component; and all persons serving as members of the Air Force under call or conscription under any provision of law. The term "officers of the Air Force" means all members of the Air Force appointed to and holding a commissioned or warrant officer grade. The term "airmen" is synonymous with "enlisted members" and means all members of the Air Force in any enlisted grade.

(c) The term "Air Force Establishment" means all commands, organizations, forces, agencies, installations, and activities, including the Department of the Air Force, all members of the Air Force, all property of every kind and character—real, personal, and mixed—and all civilian personnel, under the control or supervision of the Secretary of the Air Force.

(d) The term "Department of the Air Force" means the executive part of the Air Force Establishment at the seat of government.

TITLE I—SECRETARY, UNDER SECRETARY, AND ASSISTANT SECRETARIES OF THE AIR FORCE

SEC. 101. (a) The Secretary of the Air Force shall be responsible for and shall have the authority necessary to conduct all affairs of the Air Force Establishment, including, but not limited to, those necessary or appropriate for the training, operations, administration, logistical support and maintenance, welfare, preparedness, and effectiveness of the Air Force, including research and development, and such other activities as may be prescribed by the President or the Secretary of Defense as authorized by law. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to conduct the affairs of the Air Force Establishment.

(b) The Secretary of the Air Force may assign to the Under Secretary of the Air Force and to the Assistant Secretaries of the Air Force such of his functions, powers, and duties as he may consider proper. Officers of the Air Force shall report regarding any matters to the Secretary, Under Secretary, or either Assistant Secretary of the Air Force, as the Secretary of the Air Force may prescribe.

(c) The Secretary of the Air Force or, as he may prescribe, the Under Secretary of the Air Force or either Assistant Secretary of the Air Force, shall, in addition to other duties, be charged with supervision of the procurement activities of the Air Force Establishment, of plans for the mobilization of materials and industrial organizations essential to wartime needs of the Air Force, and of other business pertaining thereto.

(d) The Secretary of the Air Force may make such assignments and details of members of the Air Force and civilian personnel as he thinks proper, and may prescribe the duties of the members and civilian personnel so assigned; and such members and civilian personnel shall be responsible for, and shall have the authority necessary to perform, such duties as may be so prescribed for them.

(e) The Secretary of the Air Force may cause to be manufactured or produced at Government arsenals, depots, or Government-owned factories of the United States all those supplies needed by the Air Force which can be manufactured or produced upon an economical basis at such arsenals, depots, or factories.

SEC. 102. (a) There shall be in the Department of the Air Force an Under Secretary of the Air Force and two Assistant Secretaries of the Air Force, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall receive the compensation prescribed by law.

(b) In case of the death, resignation, removal from office, absence, or disability of the Secretary of the Air Force, the officer of the United States who is highest on the following list, and who is not absent, or disabled, shall, until the President directs some other person to perform such duties in accordance with section 179, Revised Statutes (5 U. S. C. 6), perform his duties until a successor is appointed, or until such absence or disability shall cease—

(1) the Under Secretary of the Air Force;

(2) the Assistant Secretaries of the Air Force in the order fixed by their length of service as such; and

(3) the Chief of Staff.

(c) If the Chief of Staff by reason of succession assumes, or if he or any other officer of the Air Force is designated in accordance with section 179, Revised Statutes (5 U. S. C. 6), to perform the duties of the Secretary of the Air Force, section 1222, Revised Statutes (10 U. S. C. 576), shall not apply to him by reason of his temporarily performing such duties.

TITLE II—CHIEF OF STAFF AND THE AIR STAFF

SEC. 201. (a) There shall be in the Department of the Air Force a staff, which shall be known as the Air Staff, and which shall consist of—

(1) the Chief of Staff;

(2) a Vice Chief of Staff;

(3) not to exceed five Deputy Chiefs of Staff; and

(4) such other members of the Air Force and such civilian officers and employees in or under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Air Force as may be assigned or detailed under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Air Force.

(b) The Air Staff shall be organized in such manner and its members shall perform such duties and bear such titles, as the Secretary of the Air Force may prescribe.

(c) Except in time of war or national emergency hereafter declared by the Congress, not more than 2,800 officers of the Air Force shall be detailed or assigned to permanent duty in the Department of the Air Force: Provided, That the numerical limit prescribed in this subsection shall not apply upon a finding by the President that an increase in the number of officers in the Department of the Air Force is in the national interest: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Air Force shall report quarterly to the Congress the number of officers in the Department of the Air Force and the justification therefor.

(d) A commissioned officer of the Air Force now or hereafter detailed or assigned to duty in the Department of the Air Force shall serve for a tour of duty not to exceed 4 years, except that such tour of duty may be extended beyond 4 years upon a special finding by the Secretary of the Air Force that the extension is necessary in the public interest. Upon relief from such duty no such officer shall again be detailed or assigned within 2 years to duty in the Department of the Air Force except upon a like finding by the Secretary of the Air Force. This subsection shall not take effect until 1 year after the enactment of this act, and shall be inapplicable in time of war or national emergency hereafter declared by the Congress.

SEC. 202. The Chief of Staff shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from the general officers of the Air Force, to serve during the pleasure of the President, but no persons shall serve as Chief of Staff for a term of more than 4 years unless reappointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Chief of Staff, while holding office as such, shall have the grade of general, without vacation of his permanent grade in the Air Force, and shall take rank as prescribed by law. He shall receive the compensation prescribed by law and shall be counted as one of the officers authorized to be serving in grade above lieutenant general under the provisions of the Officer Personnel Act of 1947 (61 Stat. 886), as amended.

SEC. 203. (a) The Vice Chief of Staff and the Deputy Chiefs of Staff shall be general officers of the Air Force detailed to those positions. In case of a vacancy in the office or the absence or disability of the Chief of Staff, the Vice Chief of Staff or the senior Deputy Chief of Staff, who is not absent or disabled, shall, unless otherwise directed by the President, perform the duties of Chief of Staff until his successor is appointed or such absence or disability shall cease.

(b) In case of a vacancy in the position, or the absence or disability, of the Vice Chief of Staff, the senior Deputy Chief of Staff who is not absent or disabled shall, unless otherwise directed by the Secretary of the Air Force, perform the duties of the Vice Chief of Staff until his successor is designated or such absence or disability shall cease.

SEC. 204. (a) The Chief of Staff shall have supervision of all members and organizations of the Air Force, shall perform the duties prescribed for him by the National Security Act of 1947, as amended, and by other laws, and shall perform such other military duties not otherwise assigned by law as may be assigned to him by the President.

(b) The Chief of Staff shall preside over the Air Staff. Subject to the provisions of section 101 of this act, and of subsection (c) of this section, he shall be directly responsible to the Secretary of the Air Force for the efficiency of the Air Force, its state of preparation for military operations, and plans therefor. He shall transmit to the Secretary of the Air Force the plans and recommendations of the Air Staff, shall advise him in regard thereto, and, upon the approval of such plans or recommendations by the Secretary of the Air Force, he shall act as the agent of the Secretary of the Air Force in carrying the same into effect.

(c) Except as otherwise prescribed by law, the Chief of Staff shall perform his duties under the direction of the Secretary of the Air Force.

SEC. 205. (a) The Air Staff shall render professional aid and assistance to the Secretary of the Air Force, the Under Secretary of the Air Force, the Assistant Secretaries of the Air Force, and the Chief of Staff.

(b) It shall be the duty of the Air Staff—

(1) to prepare such plans for the national security, and the use of the Air Force for that purpose, both separately and in conjunction with land and naval forces, and for recruiting, organizing, supplying, equipping, training, serving, mobilizing, and demobilizing the Air Force, as will assist the execution of any power vested in, duty imposed upon, or function assigned to the Secretary of the Air Force or the Chief of Staff;

(2) to investigate and report upon all questions affecting the efficiency of the Air Force and its state of preparation for military operations;

(3) to prepare detailed instructions for the execution of approved plans and to supervise the execution of such plans and instructions;

(4) to act as the agents of the Secretary of the Air Force and the Chief of Staff in coordinating the action of all organizations of the Air Force Establishment; and

(5) to perform such other duties not otherwise assigned by law as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Air Force.

TITLE III—COMPOSITION AND ORGANIZATION OF THE AIR FORCE

SEC. 301. The United States Air Force shall consist of the Regular Air Force, the Air Force Reserve, the Air National Guard of the United States and the Air National Guard while in the service of the United States; and shall include persons inducted, enlisted, or appointed without specification of component in the Air Force, and all persons serving in the Air Force under call or conscription under any provision of law, including members of the Air National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia when in the service of the United States pursuant to call as provided by law.

SEC. 302. (a) The Regular Air Force is that component of the Air Force which consists of persons whose continuous service on active duty in both peace and war is contemplated by law, and of persons who are retired members of the Regular Air Force.

(b) The Regular Air Force shall include the commissioned officers, warrant officers, and airmen holding appointments or enlisted in the Regular Air Force as now or hereafter provided by law, the retired commissioned officers, warrant officers, and airmen of the Regular Air Force, and such other persons as are now or may hereafter be specified by law. No person who is now a member of the Regular Air Force, active or retired, shall, by reason of the enactment of this act, be deprived of his membership in the Regular Air Force.

SEC. 303. The Air Force Reserve referred to in the Army and Air Force Authorization Act of 1949 shall be a Reserve component of the Air Force to provide a reserve for military service, and shall consist of all persons appointed or enlisted therein, or transferred therein, as now or hereafter provided by law.

SEC. 304. The Air National Guard of the United States referred to in the Army and Air Force Authorization Act of 1949 shall be a Reserve component of the Air Force to provide a reserve for military service, and shall consist of all federally recognized units and organizations of the Air National Guard of the several States, Territories, and District of Columbia, and of all personnel of the Air National Guard of the several States, Territories, and District of Columbia who shall have been appointed or enlisted in the Air National Guard of the United States, or who shall have been temporarily extended Federal recognition by the Secretary of the Air Force pursuant to section 530 of the Career Compensation Act of 1949 (63 Stat. 802).

SEC. 305. The Air National Guard referred to in the Army and Air Force Authorization Act of 1949, which consists of those units, organizations, and personnel of the National Guard (as that term is defined in section 71 of the National Defense Act, as amended) for which Federal responsibility has been vested in the Secretary of the Air Force or the Department of the Air Force pursuant to law, shall be, while in the service of the United States, a component of the Air Force.

SEC. 306. All persons inducted in or holding appointments or enlistments in the Air Force or transferred therein pursuant to the National Security Act of 1947, as amended, on the effective date of this act, shall be deemed, without further action, to hold their military status in the corresponding components set forth in section 301 of this act or in the Air Force without specification of component and without specification of any arm, branch, service, or corps.

SEC. 307. (a) Qualified members of the Air Force shall be designated to perform medical, dental, medical service, veterinary, nursing, women's medical specialist, judge advocate, chaplain, or other duties requiring special training or experience, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Air Force. Qualifications for designations under this subsection shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Air Force in conformity with qualifications specified in any of the following statutory provisions for the respective types of duties: Provided, That there shall be no separately constituted or administered arms, branches, services, or corps in the Air Force or any component thereof:

(1) Act of August 5, 1947 (ch. 494, title II, sec. 201; 61 Stat. 777 (10 U. S. C. 91 a, 121 a)).

(2) Act of April 23, 1907 (ch. 150, sec. 4, 35 Stat. 67 (10 U. S. C. 93)).

(3) Act of April 16, 1947 (ch. 38, title I, sec. 101 (c); 61 Stat. 41, 10 U. S. C. 166 (c)).

(4) Act of April 16, 1947 (ch. 38, title I, sec. 102 (c); 61 Stat. 42, 10 U. S. C. 166a (c)).

(5) Act of March 2, 1899 (ch. 352, sec. 7, 30 Stat. 979; 10 U. S. C. 232).

(6) Act of April 16, 1947 (ch. 38, title I, sec. 116; 61 Stat. 46, 10 U. S. C. 376).

(7) Act of August 7, 1947 (ch. 512, title V, sec. 506; 61 Stat. 890, 10 U. S. C. 506c).

(8) Act of May 16, 1950 (ch. 186, sec. 1; 64 Stat. 160, 10 U. S. C. 166b–1, 2).

(b) Original appointments made with a view to designation for the performance of duties under subsection (a) of this section shall be in the grades prescribed in any of the following statutory provisions for the respective types of duties:

(1) Act of August 5, 1947 (ch. 494, title II, sec. 201; 61 Stat. 777, 10 U. S. C. 91a, 121a).

(2) Act of April 16, 1947 (ch. 38, title I, sec. 101 (c); 61 Stat. 41, 10 U. S. C. 166 (c)).

(3) Act of April 16, 1947 (ch. 38, title I, sec. 102 (c); 61 Stat. 42, 10 U. S. C. 166a (c)).

(4) Act of April 16, 1947 (ch. 38, title I, sec. 104; 61 Stat. 43, as amended May 16, 1950; ch. 186, sec. 3 (b); 64 Stat. 160, 10 U. S. C. 166c).

(5) Act of April 16, 1947 (ch. 38, title I, sec. 105; 61 Stat. 43, 10 U. S. C. 166d).

(6) Act of April 16, 1947 (ch. 38, title I, sec. 116; 61 Stat. 46, 10 U. S. C. 376).

(7) Act of August 7, 1947 (ch. 512, title V, sec. 506; 61 Stat. 890, 10 U. S. C. 506c).

(8) Act of May 16, 1950 (ch. 186, secs. 1, 2; 64 Stat. 160, 10 U. S. C. 166b–1, 2, d–1).

(c) Members of the Air Force designated to perform duties under subsection (a) of this section shall, while performing such duties, have the benefits and be subject to the conditions provided by the following statutory provisions, insofar as the same are presently in effect, relating to their respective types of duties and components:

(1) Act of August 5, 1947 (ch. 494, title II, sec. 201; 61 Stat. 777, 10 U. S. C. 91a, 121a).

(2) Act of April 23, 1908 (ch. 150, sec. 5; 35 Stat. 67, 10 U. S. C. 101, 102).

(19) Act of October 12, 1949 (ch. 681, title II, sec. 203; 63 Stat. 809, 37 U. S. C. 234).

(d) Separate promotion lists are authorized, within the discretion of the Secretary, for each of the categories of duties to which members of the Air Force are designated under section 307 (a) of this act. Seniority and numbers in the several grades on the promotion lists so established under this section shall be as prescribed by the Secretary of the Air Force in accordance with the provisions of sections 505 (b) and 505 (d) of the Officer Personnel Act of 1947 (61 Stat. 883; 10 U. S. C. 559 (b), 559 (d)): Provided, That such provisions of said section 505 (b) as relate to medical, dental, and chaplain officers shall, for the purposes of this section, also be applicable to officers designated to perform judge advocate duties in the Air Force.

SEC. 308. (a) There shall be within the Air Force—

(1) the following major air commands:

(i) an air defense command;

(ii) a strategic air command; and

(iii) a tactical air command;

(2) such other commands, forces, and organizations as may from time to time be established by the Secretary of the Air Force.

(b) For the duration of any war or national emergency hereafter declared by the Congress, the Secretary of the Air Force may establish new major commands in lieu of, or discontinue or consolidate the major commands enumerated in, subsection (a) (1) of this section.

SEC. 309. For Air Force purposes, the United States of America, its Territories and possessions, and other territory in which elements of the Air Force may be stationed or operate, may be divided into such areas as directed by the Secretary of the Air Force; and officers of the Air Force may be assigned to command of the Air Force activities, installations, and personnel in such areas. In the discharge of the Air Force's functions or such other functions as may be authorized by other provisions of law, officers of the Air Force so assigned shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary of the Air Force may prescribe.

SEC. 310. (a) There shall be in the Air Force a Judge Advocate General who shall be appointed, subject to the provisions of the act of May 5, 1950 (64 Stat. 147; 50 U. S. C. 741), by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of 4 years, which term may be extended by the President at his discretion. Any such appointment may be terminated at any time by the President at his discretion. An officer heretofore or hereafter appointed as Judge Advocate General of the Air Force shall not be a chief of a branch, arm, or service within the meaning of section 513 of the Officer Personnel Act of 1947 (61 Stat. 901; 10 U. S. C. 559g) but he shall nevertheless, if he does not already hold a permanent appointment in the Regular Air Force in the grade of major general, be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as a permanent major general in the Regular Air Force. The officer serving as Judge Advocate General on the effective date of this act shall, subject to the provisions of this section, continue to hold his appointment as Judge Advocate General and no reappointment of such officer as Judge Advocate General shall be required after the enactment of this act.

(b) The Secretary of the Air Force, the Judge Advocate General of the Air Force, and officers heretofore or hereafter designated as judge advocates shall be vested with and shall exercise the same powers and duties with respect to the administration of military justice within the Air Force as are vested in the Secretary of the Army, the Judge Advocate General of the Army and judge advocates of the Army, respectively, with respect to the administration of military justice within the Army. The Judge Advocate General of the Air Force shall perform such other legal duties as may be directed by the Secretary of the Air Force.

TITLE IV—REPEALS, AMENDMENTS, AND SAVING PROVISIONS

SEC. 401. (a) The following laws and parts of laws are hereby repealed:

(1) The proviso of section 401 of the Army Organization Act of 1950 and all laws and parts of laws set forth in said section to the extent applicable to the Department of the Air Force or the Air Force Establishment and not heretofore repealed;

(2) Sections 1, 2, and 3 of the act of June 25, 1948 (62 Stat. 1014; 5 U. S. C. 627j–1): Provided, That such repeal shall not affect the existing applicability of the Articles of War to the Air Force and actions under such articles shall be enforced in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

(b) Sections 246, 247, 248, and 249 of the act of June 24, 1948 (62 Stat. 643; 10 U. S. C. 61, 65, 62a, 61a), shall not be construed to be applicable to the Air Force.

(c) All other laws and parts of laws to the extent that they are inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 402. The National Security Act of 1947, as amended, is hereby amended by deleting the word "command" in section 208 (b) thereof and substituting in lieu thereof the word "supervision."

SEC. 403. All laws and parts of laws not inconsistent with the provisions of this act applicable to the Air Force Establishment, or to organizations, components or personnel thereof, whether so applicable by their terms or by operation of the National Security Act of 1947, as amended, shall continue in effect and shall be construed to apply to the Air Force Establishment and to the corresponding successive organizations, components, and personnel as set forth in this act.

SEC. 404. (a) Nothing in this act shall require the reappointment or redesignation of any person in the Air Force Establishment occupying a position or performing a duty as now prescribed by law.

(b) Except as otherwise expressly provided in this act, every power vested in and every duty imposed upon any office or officer, civilian or military, of the Air Force Establishment by any law, regulation, or order in force immediately prior to the effective date of this act, shall continue to be applicable to such office and exercised and performed by such officer until the Secretary of the Air Force shall otherwise direct in accordance with the authority conferred upon him by this act.

SEC. 405. Except as provided in section 305, nothing contained in this act shall be construed to amend or repeal the provisions of law pertaining to the National Guard, the Air National Guard or the Chief of the National Guard Bureau.

SEC. 406. Under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Air Force, officers of the Air Force accountable for public moneys may intrust moneys to other officers of the Air Force for the purpose of having them make disbursements as their agents, and the officer to whom the moneys are intrusted, as well as the officer who intrusts the moneys to him, shall be held pecuniarily responsible therefor to the United States.

SEC. 407. Except as provided in section 402 of this act, nothing in this act shall be construed as amending, repealing, limiting, enlarging, or in any way modifying any provision of the National Security Act of 1947, as amended.

SEC. 408. If any provision of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances be held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the act and of the application of such provisions to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

Mr. KILDAY (interrupting the reading of the bill). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered as read and printed in the RECORD at this point and be subject to amendment at any point in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. KILDAY. There is one committee amendment, Mr. Chairman, which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. KILDAY: On page 7, line 19, strike out the word "persons" and substitute in lieu thereof the word "person."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any other amendments? If not, under the rule the Committee will now rise.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BATTLE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1726) to provide for the organization of the Air Force and the Department of the Air Force, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 88, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MAHON, Mr. NORRELL, Mr. TABER, and Mr. SCRIVNER (at the request of Mr. CANNON), for 1 day, on account of official business.

SENATE

THURSDAY, JANUARY 25, 1951

(Legislative day of Monday, January 8, 1951)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Rev. Isaac Steenson, minister, Clarendon Presbyterian Church, Arlington, Va., offered the following prayer:

Grant, O God, that those who are to bear the burden of high responsibility in this place this day may draw strength from these moments of prayer. Thou art reaching out to help them; may they reach out to Thee to be helped.

May Thy servants here never allow themselves to become common when they are called upon to deal with common things, but may there be about them a quiet dignity and sincerity that shall command respect everywhere, and that shall be more persuasive than a multitude of words.

May the voice that speaks from this place convey the accents of a higher voice than ours, that the other peoples of the world may see that our upreach is as much a part of our lives as our outreach. In the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. McFARLAND, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, January 23, 1951, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 1. An act to authorize the payment by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs of a gratuitous indemnity to survivors of members of the Armed Forces who die in active service, and for other purposes;

H. R. 1724. An act to provide for the renegotiation of contracts, and for other purposes;

H. R. 1726. An act to provide for the organization of the Air Force and the Department of the Air Force, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 87. Joint resolution amending section 5012 of the Internal Revenue Code.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] be permitted to be absent from the sessions of the Senate next week in order that he may represent this Nation in connection with the inauguration of the President of Brazil.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

On request of Mr. McFARLAND, and by unanimous consent, Mr. KEFAUVER, because of official business, was excused from attendance on the sessions of the Senate for the remainder of this week.

On his own request, and by unanimous consent, Mr. HICKENLOOPER was excused from attendance on the sessions of the Senate during next week on official business of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. GEORGE, and by unanimous consent, the Finance Committee was authorized to meet during the session of the Senate this afternoon for hearings on veterans' bills.

On request of Mr. RUSSELL, and by unanimous consent, the Committee on Armed Services was authorized to meet this afternoon during the session of the Senate.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ADDRESS BY GEN. DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER TO THE MEMBERS OF CONGRESS

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I wish to inform the Senate that Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower will address an informal meeting of the two branches of Congress in the Congressional Library next Thursday at the hour of 10:30 a. m. The meeting will be held in the Coolidge Auditorium. No tickets will be issued to Members of either House. Members will be admitted upon recognition.

We have been informed that because of the limited seating capacity Members will not be permitted to bring guests. There are about 500 seats in the auditorium. I know that every Member of the Senate is anxious to obtain the benefit of General Eisenhower's views upon the situation which he found during his recent trip to Europe. It is for that reason that I am making this announcement at this time.

It is the general's desire to meet in executive session on Thursday with members of the Armed Services Committee and the Foreign Relations Committee. I make that announcement so that committee members may know of it, and so that the chairmen of the two committees may make arrangements for the meeting.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. McFARLAND. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO CALLING THE CALENDAR

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I wish to announce that it is our intention to call the calendar from time to time, as often as possible, in order to keep it clear. While there is not much on the calendar at present, we expect to have a call of the calendar on Monday next.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Will there be an adjournment, and a call of the calendar under rule VIII?

Mr. McFARLAND. I see no objection to that being done.

Mr. WHERRY. In other words, the Senator does not intend to ask unanimous consent for the call of the calendar?

Mr. McFARLAND. No.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McFARLAND subsequently said: In further answer to the question of the distinguished minority leader, I ask unanimous consent that on next Monday, following the transaction of routine business, there be a call of the calendar for the consideration of unobjected-to bills.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senators be allowed to submit reports from committees, introduce bills and joint resolutions, and make insertions in the RECORD, without debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

REPORT ON SURVEY OF MINERAL AND NATIONAL MONUMENT VALUES, JOSHUA TREE NATIONAL MONUMENT, CALIF.

A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on a survey of the area within the revised boundaries of the Joshua Tree National Monument with a view to determining to what extent the said area is more valuable for minerals than for the national monument purposes for which it was created (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

REPORT ON LEASES OF PROPERTY BY DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY

A letter from the Secretary of the Army, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on leases of real or personal property by the Department of the Army, as of December 1, 1950 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Armed Services.

SUSPENSION OF DEPORTATION OF ALIENS—WITHDRAWAL OF NAME

A letter from the Acting Attorney General of the United States, withdrawing the name of Waclaw Zaremba from a report relating to aliens whose deportation he suspended more than 6 months ago, transmitted to the Senate on September 1, 1950; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

GRANTING OF STATUS OF PERMANENT RESIDENCE TO CERTAIN ALIENS

A letter from the Acting Attorney General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, copies of the orders of the Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, granting the applications for permanent residence to certain aliens, together with a statement of the facts and pertinent provisions of law in each case and the reasons for granting the applications (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SUSPENSION OF DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN ALIENS

A letter from the Acting Attorney General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, copies of the orders of the Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, suspending deportation of certain aliens, together with a statement of the facts and pertinent provisions of law as to each case, and the reasons for ordering such suspension (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORT ON DISPOSAL OF CERTAIN RECORDS

A letter from the Administrator of General Services Administration, transmitting, pursuant to law, the report of the Archivist of the United States on the disposal of certain records for the calendar year 1950 (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

AMENDMENT OF RUBBER ACT OF 1948

A letter from the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to repeal the first two sentences of section 9 (a) of the Rubber Act of 1948, as amended (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIAL

Petitions, and so forth, were laid before the Senate, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Colorado; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments:

"Senate Joint Memorial 2

"Memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact legislation providing for the creation of a Department of Natural Resources, the establishment of regional or branch offices of that and other Federal departments and agencies, and for the location of a United States Military Academy of the Air in Colorado

"Whereas the Honorable Herbert Hoover, Chairman of the Joint Committee on the Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government, has recommended the reorganization of the Department of the Interior and the incorporation of its functions and related functions concerned with the conservation and development of natural resources into a new Department of Natural Resources; and

"Whereas it would be highly desirable that regional offices of that and other Federal departments and agencies be established in order to bring the Federal Government and its activities closer to the people; and

"Whereas consideration is being given to the establishment of a United States Military Academy of the Air: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the senate of the thirty-eighth general assembly of the State of Colorado (the house of representatives concurring herein), That the Congress of the United States be and it is hereby memorialized to approve legislation for—

"(1) The creation of a new Department of Natural Resources;

"(2) The location of a regional office of that Department and of other important Federal departments and agencies in Colorado; and

"(3) The location of the United States Military Academy of the Air likewise in Colorado; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this memorial be forwarded to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to the Senators and Congressmen representing the State of Colorado of the United States.

"GORDON ALLOTT,
"President of the senate,
"MILDRED H. CRESSWELL,
"Secretary of the senate,
"DAVID A. HAMIL,
"Speaker of the house of representatives.
"VINCENT CRAWSHAW,
"Chief Clerk of the house of representatives."

A joint resolution of the senate of the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

"Senate Joint Resolution 1

"Joint resolution relating to the central Arizona project

"Whereas there is pending before the Congress of the United States a bill which would authorize construction of the central Arizona reclamation project; and

"Whereas no provision is made for payment by the project of any part of the interest on the national debt, which would be incurred to construct the project; and

"Whereas the Secretary of the Interior has reported that he estimates the cost of the project at $708,000,000 and the time for the recovery of the principal at 75 years, and, therefore, that the project would cost the taxpayers of the United States for interest alone, at 2½ percent per annum, in excess of $2,000,000,000; and

"Whereas the taxpayers of California would be required to pay in excess of $172,000,000 of such interest; and

"Whereas the central Arizona project is designed to provide irrigation at exorbitant cost to grow common field crops, with the result that additional taxes would be required to pay Government subsidies on such crops and such project would not, therefore, enhance the national welfare; and

"Whereas the central Arizona project would require the use of 1,500,000,000 kilowatt-hours of hydroelectric power annually (the equivalent to the use of 2,500,000 barrels of fuel oil) to pump irrigation water to a height of 1,000 feet, and such use would be an economic waste of an urgently needed public resource; and

"Whereas the construction cost of the irrigation features of the project alone would be many times the value of the land, when irrigated and the irrigators would not repay any part of such construction cost; and

"Whereas such central Arizona project is, therefore, economically unsound; and

"Whereas sufficient water for such central Arizona project could be secured only by diverting to that project water now needed to serve authorized and existing projects in the lower basin of the Colorado River; and

"Whereas the diversion of water from such existing projects would jeopardize the water supply of over 4,000,000 residents of California, who, in reliance on their contracts for water executed by the United States Government, have invested more than $500,000,000 to provide facilities to enable them to use their share of water and power from the Colorado River; and

"Whereas the rights of California to the use of Colorado River water have been established by prior appropriations and by contracts with the Secretary of the Interior under the Boulder Canyon Project Act, and the Secretary of the Interior has declared that 'If the contentions of California are correct, there will be no dependable water supply available from the Colorado River for this diversion: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California (jointly), That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to refuse passage of any bill authorizing the central Arizona project as proposed; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to adopt legislation consenting to the joinder of the United States in an interstate suit in the Supreme Court for the determination of the water rights of the States of the lower basin of the Colorado River; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Colorado River Board of California and all other agencies and officers of the State of California are directed to use all means within their power to carry out the objectives of this resolution; and be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of the senate be directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President, to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, to the chairmen of appropriate congressional committees, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

A paper in the nature of a memorial from the board of directors of the Lions Club, San Juan, Tex., relating to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to give title to the Federal Government of the tidelands off the shore of Texas; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

DEFEND AMERICA AT HOME — DON'T WASTE AMERICAN LIVES ON FOREIGN SOIL—PETITION

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference a petition signed by about 3,000 citizens of the State of Iowa, entitled "Defend America at Home—Don't Waste American Lives on Foreign Soil."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition presented by the Senator from Iowa will be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

SCHICK HOSPITAL AT CLINTON, IOWA—RESOLUTION OF IOWA LEGISLATURE

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and printing in the RECORD a certified copy of a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Iowa, requesting Congress to take immediate action to cause the Veterans' Administration to increase the use of Schick Hospital at Clinton, Iowa.

The concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 4

Whereas the former Schick General Hospital, Clinton, Iowa, now being used exclusively for domiciliary purposes by the Veterans' Administration; and

Whereas the said veterans' domiciliary at Clinton, Iowa, is now being operated at less than one-fourth the capacity of the institution, resulting in inefficient, costly, and wasteful administration; and

Whereas thousands of veterans in the central United States are now urgently in need of hospitalization, convalescence, and rehabilitation; and

Whereas many more thousands of disabled and sick veterans will soon be added, as a result of the fighting in Korea; and

Whereas the Schick Hospital should be opened to full capacity to provide care for the many thousand veterans and veterans-to-be, who are now in need of hospitalization, convalescence, and rehabilitation; and

Whereas the Iowa Senate and House of the Fifty-second General Assembly by Senate Concurrent Resolution 10, passed a resolution of February 3, 1947, requesting the Veterans' Administration to utilize Schick Hospital at Clinton, Iowa, with its suitable facilities and very desirable location for the permanent care of veterans; and

Whereas in the interests of economy and in the interest of the veterans of the central United States, we deem it advisable and necessary that the veterans' domiciliary at Clinton, Iowa, be used to full capacity; and

Whereas the Veterans' Administration has been deaf to the plea of veterans that the Schick Hospital at Clinton, Iowa, be opened to full bed capacity, thereby utilizing present existing facilities: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the house concurring), That the Congress of the United States take immediate action to cause the Veterans' Administration to increase the use of Schick Hospital at Clinton, Iowa, from the present limited 500 domiciliary beds to also include an additional minimum of 1,000 beds for hospitalization, convalescence, and rehabilitation; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be prepared and forwarded by the secretary of state to the President of the United States, to the President of the United States Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Iowa Members of the United States Senate and the Iowa Members of the House of Representatives of the Congress, and Gen. Carl R. Gray, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

O. H. HENNINGSEN.

We, W. H. Nicholas, Lieutenant Governor of Iowa and Carroll A. Lane, secretary of the senate, hereby certify that the above and foregoing resolution was adopted by the senate and house of the Fifty-fourth General Assembly of Iowa.

W. H. NICHOLAS,
Lieutenant Governor of Iowa.
CARROLL A. LANE,
Secretary of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

The following report of a committee was submitted:

By Mr. McFARLAND, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

S. 658. A bill to further amend the Communications Act of 1934; without amendment (Rept. No. 44).

RESOLUTIONS REPORTED BY COMMITTEE ON RULES AND ADMINISTRATION

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for immediate consideration of sundry resolutions ordered reported from the Committee on Rules and Administration. First, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, I report favorably Senate Resolution No. 40 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 40), as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 30,000 additional copies of the pamphlet entitled "Selling to Your Government," such additional copies to be for the use of the Select Committee on Small Business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Arizona a question as to the resolutions. How many has the Senator to report?

Mr. HAYDEN. About eight of them.

Mr. ELLENDER. How many of them would create new subcommittees?

Mr. HAYDEN. One.

Mr. ELLENDER. Will the Senator kindly tell us what that is?

Mr. HAYDEN. The resolution would not create a new subcommittee. The subcommittee was created only about a month ago. The purpose is to increase the limit of expenses under Senate Resolution 366, Eighty-first Congress, relating to investigation of internal security of the United States by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ELLENDER. Who will appoint the subcommittee?

Mr. HAYDEN. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ELLENDER. How much money is requested by the resolution?

Mr. HAYDEN. The request was for $150,000 for a 2-year term of the committee. Half of that is requested until next January.

Mr. ELLENDER. In other words, the appropriation which is sought is to be cut in half?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. ELLENDER. The proposed appropriation is to be for 1 year, instead of allowing $150,000 for 1 year?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; the request was for $150,000 for 2 years. We limited the time to January 31 on all these resolutions, because they will come back to the committee, and the Senate can consider them again next January.

Mr. ELLENDER. Do the resolutions give authority to the committee to select experts and a clerical force in addition to the experts and clerical forces now authorized by the Reorganization Act?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, reserving the right further to object, I am in hopes the matter will be delayed for a week or 10 days. As chairman of the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee dealing with the legislative branch, I asked Mr. Oco Thompson, the Financial Clerk of the Senate, to prepare for me some data showing the extent to which the Senate has been spending money for special investigations. The work has not yet been completed, but I have today a partial report and offer it to the Senate for its perusal. The summary was made by Mr. Thompson, as I have just indicated, for the 10-year period from the year 1940 to the year 1950, with an estimate for 1951.

There is a great hue and cry about cutting expenses here and cutting expenses there in an effort to try to reduce Government spending. I think we in the Senate should set the example.

For the fiscal year 1940 the total amount of money spent by the Senate from the contingent fund for special investigations amounted to $170,268.04. For 1941 it was approximately the same amount. For 1942 it was $210,000 plus. For 1943 it was $381,000 plus. For 1944 it was $385,000 plus. For 1945 it was $427,000 plus. For 1946 it was $588,000 plus. For 1947 it was $692,000 plus. For 1948 it was $1,269,603. For 1949 it was $1,068,461. For last year, 1950, it was $1,277,000 plus. The estimate for 1951 is $1,732,000.

Mr. President and Members of the Senate, as I tried to point out a moment ago, these sums are in addition to the amount which is now being spent by all the regular committees of this body. These sums do not include the tremendous cost of printing the many reports made by these special committees. As all Senators know, under the Reorganization Act each committee is empowered to employ a force of six on its clerical staff, and a force of four experts. I would urge no objection to the creation of necessary special committees created by the standing committees of the Senate provided that the expert and clerical assistance used would be that provided for under the Reorganization Act. I realize that in some cases it may be necessary to provide additional help, and if a good case can be made, then the Senate should act accordingly.

A certain practice has arisen here. I do not want to accuse any Senator. But we have in the Capitol quite a few experts who seem to be very good at selling themselves to Senate groups, organizing special committees to investigate all sorts of problems, and they succeed in spending quite a bit of money in so doing.

I wish to ask the Senator from Arizona to postpone consideration of the resolutions for 10 days so that we can look further into the matter and allow me to bring before the Senate the whole picture, including in detail the amount of money we are now spending for such purposes, and the possibilities of having all investigations made within the committees themselves with the force that each committee is empowered to employ to conduct its business. I believe that I can present what I consider as astounding figures, the excessive printing bills incident to this special work.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the Committee on Rules and Administration adopted the practice that no resolution providing for an investigation shall extend it any further than January 31 of this year. All the committees that were created in the last Congress were to expire on the 31st of January. So it would seem proper——

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. May I suggest, if the Senator insists on action being taken now, that we extend the life of the existing subcommittees to June 30, the end of the present fiscal year? That would include existing subcommittees that have been heretofore at work and not those that have not been organized and without clerical and expert assistance. That will give us a chance to look into the matter. It will give Congress a better opportunity of taking up the question during this year when we provide for funds to operate the legislative branch of our Government for the next fiscal year. If the Senator will consent to follow my suggestion I shall not object. I should like opportunity further to study this matter with a view of trying to save a few dollars, if I can. It strikes me that if we are to save money for the taxpayers during this emergency we in the Senate should set the example, as I indicated a while ago.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have been greatly delighted to hear what the Senator from Louisiana has said. I think the Senate ought to take the lead in cutting down expenditures, and in many cases cutting out expenditures. I hope the Senator will not ask that the subcommittee be empowered to continue until next June. I believe, if the Senator will examine the situation, he will find that the money can be cut out at the present time, that it will not be necessary to provide money to carry on the work until June. When matters of this kind are postponed from time to time, as the Senator knows, it is very difficult to prevent adoption of resolutions relating to them when a Senator asks for their adoption. I hope the Senator will act at once. The Senator is a very able member of the Appropriations Committee and has done wonderful work on that committee, and I hope he will undertake to have action taken to end the work now.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, let me reply to the Senator from Tennessee. In the first place the fiscal year has nothing to do with the session of Congress. The fiscal year operates with respect to the executive branch of the Government. Congress meets in January and adjourns some time in the summer when it gets around to it. So the appropriations have to start in January. The 30th of June is a date of no significance so far as Congress is concerned.

Second, let me point out——

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, the Senator well knows that once special committees are established, it is rather hard to root them out. From time to time they seem to be able to obtain funds with which to continue and with which to build up large clerical and expert forces.

This is my fifteenth year of service as a Member of the Senate, and from session to session I have seen here a good many of the same persons, who work from one special subcommittee to another. They seem to have a knack at being able to "sell a bill of goods" to some of my distinguished colleagues. A special subcommittee employing a large staff is created, and it goes on from year to year.

I do not think I am being unreasonable about this matter and I again renew my suggestion.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the Senator should be fair about it. There are men who are expert investigators.

Mr. ELLENDER. I wish to say that my comments may not be applicable to all such subcommittees, but I know of quite a number which I would brand in that way.

Mr. HAYDEN. If such persons are efficient and if they do the work required to be done, why not employ them?

Mr. ELLENDER. As I have just pointed out to the distinguished Senator, in the past 10 years the amounts spent for these purposes have increased enormously. Today we are spending 10 times more for these purposes than we spent 10 years ago. It strikes me that we should draw the line somewhere. All I am requesting is a little more time to study the resolution. The distinguished Senator has reported these resolutions to the Senate today, and I should like to have a little time in which to consider them.

As chairman of the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, dealing with legislative expenditures, I am responsible to some extent for recommending appropriations of these funds, and I should like to have an opportunity to look into the matter, with a view to ascertaining how much more money it will cost.

The Senator from Arizona has eight more resolutions ready. I do not know what the total amount will be; but I have before me a brief statement, prepared by Mr. Oco Thompson, financial clerk of the Senate, which indicates that for the last 5 months of 1950 special committees have spent $866,029.19. That is five times more than was spent in the entire fiscal year of 1940.

I believe that we should draw the line somewhere and should show an inclination to economize in our own operations.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in full in the RECORD, following my remarks, the figures to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the tabulations were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Expenditures paid by the Senate during the fiscal years shown for investigations by the standing committees (including subcommittees), special committees, and joint committees

Fiscal year:
1940	$170,268.04
1941	170,619.16
1942	210,574.02

1944	335,983.52
1945	427,574.15
1946	588,507.15
1947	692,603.65
1948	1,269,603.02
1949	1,277,094.39
1950	1,732,000.00
1951 (estimated)	1,068,461.45
